European Trout (Salmo trutta).

ous forms have been alternately combined and then separated into subspecies and varieties, or accorded full specific rank. Day considers that there are but two species of British Salmonidæ—the salmon, Salmo salar, and the trout, S. trutta. Others divide the latter into S. trutta and S. fario, and these again into others, as S. cambricus, the Gilt-head trout; S. leucenis, the Loch Leven trout; etc. (b) In America there are several black-spotted trouts, specifically distinct from the European S. trutta, but belonging to the same section of the genus Salmo, commonly called trout, with or without a qualifying term (like the species of Salvelinus; see def. 2). All these inhabit western portions of the continent. Such are S. gairdneri, with moderate-sized scales, 120 to 150 in a row, and 10 anal rays, of the Pacific slope waters; the rainbow-trout, S. irideus (see cut under rainbow-trout), closely related to the foregoing, native of streams west of the Sierra Nevada, and now much diffused by pisciculture; the Rocky Mountain trout, S. purpuratus (see lake-trout, 1, and cut under Salmo).

And now, having caught three brace of Trouts, I will tell you a short tale as we walk towards our breakfast.

I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 99.

2. A fish of the family Salmonidæ and genus Salvelinus (with its section Cristivomer), resembling those called in Europe char. See Salvelinus, and cuts under char and lake-trout, 2. All the American chars are called trout, with or without a qualifying term. These are red-spotted. The leading forms are the common speckled trout, or brook-trout, of eastern North America, S. fontinalis; the blue-backed trout, S. quassa, of Maine, Vermont, etc.; the Dolly Varden trout of the Pacific slope, S. malma, whose red spots are very large; together with the great lake-trout, S. (Cristivomer) namaycush. See phrases following.

trover (trō-vēr'), n. [< OF. trover, F. trouver = Pr. trobar = Sp. Pg. trovar = It. trovare, find, invent, *< ML. tropare, compose, sing. Cf. troubadour, trouvère, and treasure-trove.] Properly, the finding of anything; specifically, in law: (a) the gaining possession of personal property, whether by finding or otherwise; (b) a common-law action for damages for the wrongful taking or detention of goods from the possession of another. Originally this action was based on the finding by defendant of the plaintiff's goods and converting them to his own use. In course of time, however, the suggestion of the finding became mere matter of form, and all that had to be proved was that the goods were the plaintiff's and that the defendant had converted them to his own use. In this action the plaintiff could not recover the specific chattel, but only damages for its conversion. The action for such damages is now called an action for conversion.

trou¹ (trō), v. t. [< ME. trowen, trouwen, trouwen, trouwen, < AS. treōwian, trūwian, believe, trust, confide, also show to be true, justify, = OS. triūn = OFries. trouwa = D. vertrouwen, trust (trouwen, marry), = MLG. triuwen = OHG. triuēn, triuēn, triuēn, MHG. triuēn, triuēn, trouwen, trouwen, G. trauen, hope, believe, trust, = Icel. trúa = Sw. dan. tro, believe, = Goth. trauan, believe, trust; connected with the adj. AS. trēowe, etc., true, from a root (Teut. √ tru) found also in trust: see true, a., true, n., and trust.] 1. About 100 species are known, of which about 20 are found in the United States, as T. monachus.

troy (trōi), n. Short for troy weight.

troy weight (trōi wāt). [Early mod. E. also Troie weight, earlier weight of Troy (weight of Troyes, Arnold's Chron., p. 108): so called with ref. to Troyes, a town in France, southeast of Paris, of considerable importance in the fourteenth century. Nearly all the principal towns or seats of commerce in the middle ages had their own weights and measures, the pound, foot, gallon, etc., varying from one town to another, sometimes even from one quarter to another. The pound of Troyes in the early part of the fourteenth century was adopted to some extent in other places and in England, but was then specifically designated as "of Troyes" (of Troy). Later, troy weight losing recognized connection with a locality, the first element became a mere attributive, and the phrase was thus generally reduced to troy.] A weight chiefly used in weighing bread, silk, gold, silver, and articles of jewelry, but now only for gold and silver. It was brought into England in the latter part of the reign of Edward III., and was adopted for the coinage in 1527. The table of troy weight is as follows:

Pound.	Ounces.	Pennyweights.	Grains.
1	= 12	= 240	= 5,760
		1	= 24

truck¹ (truk), n. [< OF. trog, troc, F. troc =

Sp. truco, trueque, exchange, barter, = Pg. troco, change of a piece of gold or silver, troca, barter; from the verb.] 1. Exchange of commodities; barter. See truck system, below.

And no commutation or truck to be made by any of the petie marchants without the assent above said.

Hakluyt's Voyages, l. 228.

The earliest form of exchange must have consisted in giving what was not wanted directly for that which was wanted. This simple traffic we call barter or truck, the French troc. Jevons, Money and Mech. of Exchange, p. 3.

2. Traffic; intercourse; dealing. [Colloq.]

Much other truck we had, and after two dayes he came aboard, and did eate and drinke with vs very merrily.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, l. 82.

3. The truck system.

It is no doubt difficult to work the lumber trade, where gangs of men are despatched great distances, or the fishing trade, without some resort to truck.

Sir C. W. Dilke, Probs. of Greater Britain, l. 2.

4. Commodities for barter or trade. (a) Small wares; stuff; goods; gear; belongings; hence, rubbish.

[Colloq.]

[morial, p. 360.]

They gin' her a 'bundance of truck; I don't know what all; and none of 'em hold her at all.

A. B. Longstreet, Georgia Scenes, p. 192.

(b) The produce of a market-garden. [U. S.]—Truck

Act. (a) An English statute of 1831 (1 and 2 Wm. IV., c.

37) requiring wages of workmen to be paid in coin or current money instead of goods. (b) A statute of 1870 (33 and 34 Vict., c. 105), also called the Truck Commission Act, which appointed a commission to inquire into the working of the act of 1831.—Truck system, the practice of paying the wages of workmen in goods instead of money.

This practice has prevailed in Great Britain and elsewhere, particularly in the mining and manufacturing districts, the masters establishing warehouses or shops on which the workmen in their employment receive orders from time to time for supplies of provisions, etc., the rest of their wages, if any, being paid in money at the end of the month, or in orders which may be discounted at the store. In some instances the workmen receive payment of their wages in money on a tacit or express understanding that they are to resort to the premises of their masters for such necessities as they require. Under this system the workmen have often to pay exorbitant prices for their goods, and from the great facility afforded to them of procuring liberal supplies of goods in anticipation of wages, they are apt to be led into debt. The system was prohibited in Great Britain in 1831, by statute 1 and 2

William IV., c. 37, which requires that the wages of workmen be paid in coin or current money, and not in goods.

The system, however, still flourishes more or less openly.

truffle (trūf'), n. [Formerly also trufte; = D. truffel = G. trüffel = Sw. truffel = Dan. trüffel, < OF. trufte, with unorig. l, for trufe, trufte, F. truffe = Pr. trufa = Sp. trufa, truffe; prob. < L. tubera, neut. pl. (taken later as fem. sing.) of tuber, an esculent root, a tuber: see tuber. Cf. F. tartouffe, < Oit. tartuffola, tartuffolo (Milanese tartuffol, Venetian tartuffola), truffle (> G. tartuffel, kartuffel, potato), also tartuffo, tartuffo, truffe; prob. < L. terræ tubera, 'earth-tubers': terræ, gen. of terra, earth; tuber, tuber. Cf. trifle.] A subterranean edible fungus, especially of the ascomycetous genus Tuber. The common English truffle, T. aestivum, is roundish in shape, and is covered externally with polygonal warts. It is black outside, and brownish veined with white inside, and grows in calcareous soils, usually under birch- or oak-trees. Truffles are much esteemed as an ingredient in high-seasoned dishes. As there is no appearance above ground to indicate their presence, dogs and pigs are frequently trained to find them by the scent, and scratch or root them up. Many persons also become expert in selecting the places where they are likely to grow. The most famous field for the production of truffles is the old province of Périgord in France. The commonest species of the French markets is T. melanosporum. T. magnatum is the garlic-scented truffle of Italy. Other edible species of Tuber are T. brumale, T. mesentericum, etc. The celebrated potato-like truffle of Italy, etc., is Terfezia leonis. The false truffle, which is frequently sold in the English and continental markets, is Scleroderma vulgare, allied, as is the so-called red truffle, Melanogaster variopatus, to the puffballs. See Tuber, 2, and compare tuckahoe.

A dish of truffles, which is a certain earth nut, found out by an hog's train'd to it, and for which those animals are sold at a great price. Evelyn, Diary, Sept. 30, 1644.

A musical wind-instrument, properly of metal, consisting of a Cavalry-trumpet.

cup-shaped mouthpiece, a long cylindrical or short conical tube, and a flaring bell. The tones are produced by the vibrations of the player's lips. The fundamental tone of the tube depends on its length, but by varying the force of the breath and the method of embouchure, a considerable series of harmonics can also be produced, so that the compass of the instrument extends to about four octaves, the tones in the upper part of the series lying close together. By the addition of a slight like that of the trombone, or of valves, as in the cornet à pistons, or of finger-holes and keys, as in the key-bugle and the serpent, a large number of other tones can be secured, so as to give a very full and continuous compass well adjusted to intonation. The fundamental tone can be extensively varied in modern instruments by the use of crooks. The trumpet is the typical instrument of a very numerous family of instruments, of which the horn, the bugle, the cornet, the trombone, the tuba, the euphonium, and the serpent are prominent members. The name trumpet itself has been applied to a large number of different instruments at different times. In ancient times two varieties were important—the one straight (the tuba) and the other curved (the lituus), the latter being often made of wood or horn. In the medieval period the evolution of a great number of variants was rapid, with lituus, clarino, and principale. The instrument is most common now in works of a martial or festal character, but it is also useful for adding color to various combinations, especially with other wind-instruments. Music for the trumpet is traditionally written in the key of C, and the intended fundamental tone (to be obtained by the use of the appropriate crook) is indicated at the beginning, a "clarino in F" or "tromba in E." Instruments of the trumpet class have always been used for military purposes, especially for signaling and in military bands.

Trumpet, or a lute-like trumpet, that clepeth to mete, o men togedur. Sistrum. Prompt. Parv., p. 504.

2. In organ-building, a powerful reed-stop having a tone somewhat resembling that of the trumpet.—3†. A trumpeter; one who sounds a trumpet, either literally or figuratively.

trumpet-fish (trum'pet-fish), n. 1. A fish of the family Centriscidae, as Centriscus scolopax; a bellows-fish or sea-snipe: so called from the long tubular snout. See cut under snipe-fish.—2. A fish of the family Fistulariidae; a tobacco-pipe fish.

trumpet-flower (trum'pet-flou'er), n. 1. A plant of the genus Tecoma or of the allied genus Bignonia: so called with reference to the shape of the flowers. The best-known, perhaps, is T. radicans, the trumpet-creeper. T. grandiflora, the great trumpet-flower of China and Japan, is a less hardy and less high-climbing, but even more showy vine, having orange-scarlet bell-shaped flowers 3 inches broad, borne in clusters, each flower drooping. T. stans, the shrubby trumpet-flower, is a neat shrub 4 feet high with lemon-yellow flowers in large clusters, hardy only southward. Greenhouse species are T. Capensis of South Africa with curved orange flowers, and T. jacinthoides of Australia with white flowers purple in the throat. Bignonia capreolata of the southern United States, the cross-vine or quarter-vine (see both words), or tendrilled trumpet-flower, has large reddish-yellow flowers borne singly, and is moderately hardy at the north. E. venusta from Brazil is a gorgeous greenhouse climber with scarlet flowers.

2. One of various plants of other genera, as Solanandra, Brunfelsia, Catalpa (West Indies), and Datura, especially D. suaveolens and other South American species, being trees with pendent blossoms.—Evergreen trumpet-flower, the yellow jasmine, Gelsemium sempervirens, once classed in the genus Bignonia.—Peach-colored trumpet-flower, Solanandra grandiflora.—Shrubby trumpet-flower. See def. 1.—Tendrilled trumpet-flower. See def. 1.—Virginian trumpet-flower, a foreign name of the trumpet-creeper.

trumpet-fly (trum'pet-flī), n. Same as gray-fly.

trumpet-gall (trum'pet-gäl), n. A small trumpet-shaped gall occurring commonly upon grape-vines in the United States. The adult fly is not known, but from the gall alone the species has been called by Osten Sacken Cecidomyia vitis-viticola.

trumpet-gourd (trum'pet-görd), n. See gourd, 1.

trumpet-honeysuckle (trum'pet-hun'i-suk-l), n. See honeysuckle, 1.

trumpeting (trum'pet-ing), n. [< trumpet + -ing.] 1. The act of sounding a trumpet, of emitting a trumpet-like sound, or of publishing by or as by sounding a trumpet.—2. In coal-mining, a division made in a shaft for ventilation or other purposes. What is generally called trumpeting is a compartment or passageway built vertically along one corner of the shaft by an arched brattice of brick.

trumpet-jasmine (trum'pet-jas'min), n. See Tecoma.

trumpet-keck (trum'pet-kek), n. See keck, 3.

trumpet-lamp (trum'pet-lamp), n. The name given by coal-miners in England to the Mueseler or Belgian safety-lamp. See safety-lamp.

trumpetleaf (trum'pet-lëf), n. One of several species of Sarracenia or pitcher-plant, found in the southern United States, with leaves more like trumpets than like pitchers. Of these S. flava, yellow trumpetleaf or trumpets, has yellow flowers, and erect leaves from 1 to 3 feet long with an open mouth and erect hood; S. variolaris, spotted trumpetleaf, also yellow-flowered, has the leaves spotted toward the end, broadly winged, with an ovate hood overarched the mouth; S. rubra, red-flowered trumpetleaf, has crimson flowers and slender leaves, with an erect hood around the mouth; and S. Drummondii, great trumpetleaf, has similar but longer leaves, with the hood variegated and purple-veined, the flowers deep-purple and very large.

trumpet-lily (trum'pet-lil'i), n. The calla-lily, Richardia Africana; also, Lilium longiflorum, and some other true lilies.

trumpet-major (trum'pet-mä'jör), n. A head trumpeter in a band or regiment.

trumpet-milkweed (trum'pet-milk'wëd), n. Same as wild lettuce (b) (which see, under lettuce). Also trumpetweed.

trumpet-reed (trum'pet-rëd), n. See reed, 1.
trumpetry (trum'pet-ri), n. [< trumpet + -(-)ry.] Trumpets collectively. [Rare.]

A prodigious annual pageant, chariot, progress, and flourish of trumpetry.

Thackeray, Roundabout Papers, Thorns in the Cushion.

The deep damnation of his taking-off.

Shak., Macbeth, l. 7. 19.

trumpet-tree (trum'pet-trë), n. A tree, Cecropia peltata, with hollow stem and very large peltate leaves. Also trumpetwood and snake-wood.

trumpet-vine (trum'pet-vin), n. Same as trumpet-creeper.—Trumpet-vine seed-worm, the larva of Trumpet-vine Seed-worm (Clydonopteron tecomæ).

a, part of pod broken so as to show larva, natural size; b, larva, side view; c, pupa, ventral view; d, male moth expanded; e, female moth at rest; f, hole from which moth issued. (Hair-lines show natural sizes.)

a tortricid moth, Clydonopteron tecomæ, which lives in the seed-pods of the trumpet-creeper, Tecoma radicans.

trumpetweed (trum'pet-wëd), n. 1. A large South African seaweed: same as sea-trumpet, 2.

—2. The jopeye-weed or gravelroot, Eupatorium purpureum: so called from the use to which the stems are put by children.

They were hidden and shaded by the broad-leaved horse-and trumpet-weeds in the fence-row.

The Century, XXXVI. 80.

3. Same as wild lettuce (b) (which see, under lettuce).

trumpetwood (trum'pet-wüd), n. Same as trumpet-tree.

trunple (trum'pi), n. [Origin obscure.] A skua-gull or jäger. See cuts under skua and Stercorarius. [Orkneys.]

truncal (trung'kal), a. [< L. truncus, trunk, + -al.] Of or pertaining to the truncus or trunk of the body.

truncate (trung'kät), v. t.; pret. and pp. truncated, ppr. truncating. [< L. truncatus, pp. of truncare, cut off, reduce to a trunk: see trunk, v.] 1. To reduce in size or quantity by cutting; cut down; maim.

The examples are too often injudiciously truncated.

2. In crystal, to cut off an angle or edge by a plane section.

If a rhombohedron be positioned so as to rest upon one of its apices, the faces of one hexagonal prism would truncate the lateral edges of the rhombohedron, while the faces of the other hexagonal prism would truncate its lateral solid angles.

Encyc. Brit., XVI. 348.

Truncated cone or pyramid, a cone or a pyramid whose vertex is cut off by a plane parallel to its base; the frustum of a cone or pyramid. See cut under frustum.—Truncated cube, cuboctahedron, dodecahedron, icosahedron, icosidodecahedron, octahedron, tetrahedron. See the nouns.

truncate (trung'kât), a. [L. truncatus, pp.: see the verb.] Truncated. Specifically—(a) In bot., appearing as if cut short at the tip by a transverse line, as the leaf of the tulip-tree, Liriodendron tulipifera. (b) In zool. and anat., cut off; cut short; shortened by the removal of a part from either end. Especially—(1) Cut squarely off; cut straight across; hence, square, straight, or even at the end, as if so cut: as, the truncate tail of a fish or a bird. (2) In conch., broken off, as the apex of a conical or spiral shell; having lost the point of the spire.—Truncate elytra, those elytra which are cut off squarely at the apex, leaving the tip of the abdomen exposed. See Truncatipennes.

Truncate Leaf of Tulip-tree.

point of the spire.—Truncate elytra, those elytra which are cut off squarely at the apex, leaving the tip of the abdomen exposed. See Truncatipennes.

truncately (trung'kât-li), adv. In a truncate manner; so as to be or to seem truncated.

Pg. It. tronco, < L. truncus, a stock, trunk, < truncus, OL. truncus, cut off, maimed, mutilated. Hence ult. (< L. truncus) E. trunk, trunch, truncheon, etc. Cf. Lith. trunkas, block, log.] 1. The woody stem of a tree, from which the branches spring.

Lowes on the truncke as wounds him in the rynde, A lite humour whence out of it is ronne.

With chaved ley the wounde ayein to bynde.

2. In arch., the shaft of a column; the part between the base and the capital. The term is sometimes used to signify the die or body of a pedestal. See cut under column.—3. The main part or stem of a branching organ or system of organs, considered apart from its ramifications, as, the trunk of an artery, a vein, or a nerve, the trunk of a zoöphyte or coral. Also truncus.

—4. The human body or that of an animal without the head and limbs, and, in animals, the tail, or considered apart from these; in literary use, the body. In entomology the trunk is the body exclusive of the head, legs, wings, and elytra: the word was used by the older entomologists in describing those insects which have the thorax closely united to the abdomen, as the beetles and grasshoppers. The trunk was said to be distinct when it was separated from the head. Some entomologists, following Fabricius, restrict trunk to the thorax (in which sense also truncus).

To hold opinion with Pythagoras, That souls of animals infuse themselves Into the trunks of men.

Shak., M. of V., iv. 1. 138.

What new friend have I found, that dares deliver This loaden trunk from his afflictions?

Fletcher, Double Marriage, iv. 3.

Now his troops

Covered that earth they had fought on with their trunks.

B. Jonson, Catiline, v. 6.

My head, I'll work the senseless trunk t' appear

To him as it had got a second being.

Massinger, Duke of Milan, v. 2.

5. A receptacle with stiff sides and a hinged cover or upper part, used especially for carrying clothes, toilet articles, etc., for a journey.

To lie like pawns locked up in chests and trunks.

Shak., K. John, v. 2. 141.

Then for to show I make nae lie,

Look ye my trunk, and ye will see.

Lord Dingwall (Child's Ballads, I. 292).

John soon after arrives with her trunks, and is installed in her school.

W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 218.

6. In fishing, an iron hoop with a bag, used to catch crustaceans. E. H. Knight.—7. A tube of various kinds and uses. (a) A speaking-tube.

This fellow waits on him now in tennis court seats, or slippers soled with wool: and they talk each to other in trunk.

B. Jonson, Epicoene, i. 1.

Are there no trunks to convey secret voices?

Shirley, Traitor, iii. 1.

(b) A telescope.

Oh, by a trunk! I know it, a thing no bigger than a flute-case: a neighbor of mine, a spectacle-maker, had drawn the moon through it at the bore of a whistle, and made it as great as a drum-head twenty times, and brought it within the length of this room to me, I know not how often.

B. Jonson, World in the Moon.

(c) A pea- or bean-shooter; a long tube through which peas, pellets, etc., were driven by the force of the breath.

While he shot sugar-plums at them out of a trunk which they were to take up.

Hovell, Letters, i. iii. 37.

In a shooting trunk, the longer it is, to a certain limit the swifter and more forcibly the air drives the pellet.

Ray.

The F. word for 'trunnion' is touillon.] 1. One of the cylindrical projections on the sides of a cannon, cast or forged in one piece with the cannon itself, which support it on its carriage. In the United States artillery service the diameter of the trunnion in smooth-bore guns has generally been equal to the diameter of the bore. See cut under howitzer.

2. In steam-engines, a hollow gudgeon on each side of an oscillating cylinder, which supports the cylinder, and through which steam is received and exhausted.

trunnioned (trun'yón'd), a. [< trunnion + -ed]. Provided with trunnions, as the cylinder of an oscillating steam-engine.

trunnion-lathe (trun'yón-läth), n. A lathe especially designed for forming the trunnions of ordnance or of oscillating cylinders. E. H. Knight.

trunnion-plate (trun'yón-plät), n. 1. A raised rim forming a shoulder around the trunnion on the side of the gun.—2. A plate of iron covering the top of a wooden gun-carriage on each side, and carried down into the recess for the trunnion so as to take the weight of the gun, and prevent it from crushing the wood. See cut under gun-carriage.

trunnion-ring (trun'yón-ring), n. In old-fashioned cannon, a ring cast solid with the piece and near the trunnions, usually between them and the muzzle. See cut under cannon.

trunnion-sight (trun'yón-sit), n. A front sight placed on the rimbase of a cannon. A lug is usually left on the curved surface to form a base for the sight.

trunnion-valve (trun'yón-valv), n. A valve attached to or included in the trunnions of an oscillating-cylinder steam-engine so as to be reciprocated by the motions of the cylinder.

Trupialis (tró-pi-ä'tis), n. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1850, after Merrem, 1826), < F. troupiale: see troopial.] A genus of Neotropical Icteridæ, of the subfamily Sturnellinæ, and very near Sturnella itself, as T. militaris. These birds closely resemble the common field-larks or meadow-starlings of the United States, but have a brick-red color on the parts which are yellow in the latter. The name was originally an exact synonym of Agelaius; in its present sense it is synonymous with Leistes.

trush, v. An obsolete form of truss.

trusion (tró'zhon), n. [As if < L. trusio(n), < trudere, pp. trusus, push: see threat. Cf. intrusion.] The act of pushing or thrusting. [Now rare.]

Engines and machines work by trusion or pulsion.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, v. § 5.

By attraction we do not here understand what is improperly, though vulgarly, called so in the operations of drawing, sucking, pumping, &c., which is really pulsion and trusion.

Bentley, Boyle Lectures, Sermon vii.

truss (trus), v. [< ME. trussen, trushen = MHG. trossen, < OF. trosser, trosser, trosser, torser, F. trosser = Pr. trossar = Sp. trozar, pack, bind, tie, tuck up, truss, = It. torciare, twist, wrap, tie, *< ML. tortiare, < L. torus, pp. of torgere, twist: see tort. Cf. torch, < ML. tertia, a torch, orig. a piece of twisted rope. Hence ult. truss, n., trouse, trousers, trousseau.] I. trans. 1. To tie up; pack in a bundle; bundle: often with up.

It was trussed up in his wallet.

4. To seize and hold firmly; seize and carry off: said especially of birds of prey.

Braue falcons that dare truss a fowl

Much greater than themselves.

Chapman, Bussy D'Ambois, iii. 1.

5. To make fast, as the wings of a fowl to the body preparatory to cooking it; skewer.

The second course was two ducks trussed up in the form of fiddles.

Swift, Gulliver's Travels, iii. 2.

6. To hang: usually with up.

The Jury said, the Judge unjust:

Sentence was said I should be truss'd.

Gascoigne (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 63).

I have been provost-marshal twenty years,

And have truss'd up a thousand of these rascals.

Beau. and Fl., Little French Lawyer, v. 3.

7. In building, to furnish with a truss; suspend or support by a truss.—8. To drive off; rout.

The Brehaigns went out thaim faise trussing,

Wheroff Brehaigne was astoned sore,

And defendid thaim feibly euermore.

Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), I. 2154.

II. t. intrans. 1. To pack; make ready.—2. To go; be off; begone, as one who has been sent packing.

He has noug'her wel-come and his mony tales,

Bote our-al i-hunted and hote [ordered] to trusse.

Piers Plowman (A), ii. 194.

truss (trus), n. [< ME. trusse = MHG. trosse, G. tross, < OF. (and F.) troussse = Pr. trossa = Sp. troja = Pg. trouxa, a bundle, pack; from the verb.] 1. A bundle; pack.

Undir his hede no pilowe was,

But in the stede a trusse of gras.

Rom. of the Rose, I. 4004.

The halfe of them carrying harquebushes, and the other halfe Turkish bowes, with their trusses of arrowes.

Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 115.

He took his truss and came away with them in the Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 376.

Specifically.—2. A bundle of hay or straw.

(a) A quantity of hay tied together, and having a definite weight, usually stated at 50 pounds, but, according to a statute of George III., 56 pounds of old hay or 60 pounds of new. Statutes of George II. legalized local trusses of 36 pounds in London and 7 pounds in Bristol. (b) A bunch of straw tied together, and generally stated at 30 pounds, which is, however, merely the London truss of hay. (c) A quantity of hay cut by a special knife out of the mass of a haystack, approximately cubical in form.

3. In hort., a compact terminal flower-cluster of any kind, as an umbel, corymb, or spike.—4. In surg., an appliance consisting of a belt or an elastic steel spring encircling the body, to which is attached a pad, used in cases of rupture to hinder the descent of the parts, or to prevent an increase in size of an irreducible hernia.—5. A garment worn in the sixteenth century and previously: probably so called from being laced closely to the person.

Thus put he on his arming truss, fair shoes upon his feet,

About him a mandilion.

Chapman, Iliad, x. 119.

Puts off his palmer's weed unto his truss, which bore

The stains of ancient arms.

Dayton.

6. pl. Trousers; tight-fitting drawers. See trouse, trousers.

Nashe, Pierce Penilesse, p. 20.

Gasp. Canst be close?

Gorg. As . . . a pair of trusses to an Irishman's buttocks.

Shirley, Love Tricks, i. 1.

7. In building, a stiff frame; a combination of timbers, of iron parts, or of timbers and iron-work, so arranged as to constitute an unyielding frame. The simplest example of a truss is the principal or main couple of a roof (see cuts under roof and queen-post), in which the tie-beam is suspended in the middle by the king-post to the apex of the angle formed by the meeting of the rafters. The feet of the rafters being tied together by the beam, and being thus incapable of yielding in the direction of their length, their apex becomes a fixed point, to which the beam is trussed or tied up to prevent its sagging, and to prevent the rafters from sagging struts are inserted. There are other forms of truss suited to different purposes, but the conditions are the same in all—namely, the establishing of fixed points to which the tie-beam is trussed. Two points of attachment are sometimes substituted for the single one, and two suspending posts are required; these are called queen-posts, and the truss is called a queen-post truss. The principle of the truss is of very wide application in bridge-building. Trusses of various forms are much used in iron-construction.

8. In arch., a large corbel or modillion supporting a mural monument or any object projecting from the face of a wall. See crosslet, 1 (a), with cut.—9. In ship-building, a short piece of carved wood fitted under the taffrail: chiefly used in small ships.—10. A heavy iron fitting by which the lower yards of vessels are secured to the lower mast and on which they swing. Formerly yards were kept in place by trusses of rope which passed round the yard and mast and were kept taut by truss-tackles which were hooked to the truss-pendants.

braces pass between the main obliques.—Linville truss, a beam-truss of which the web-members are composed of vertical posts and diagonal rods or bars extending from the head of one post to the foot of the second post beyond.—McCallum inflexible arch-truss, a beam-truss with an arched upper chord, and inclined struts extending from it to the abutment end of the lower chord. It has posts and diagonals, the distance between the former diminishing from the middle toward the ends. See fifth cut under bridge!.—Mocmain truss. See mocmain.—Pratt truss, a beam-truss having vertical posts and inclined tension-members. See fig. a, above.—Rider truss. See rider.—Truss-arch bridge. See truss-arch bridge, under bridge!.

truss (truss'), a. [<truss, n.] Bunchy; stumpy; stocky; round and thick.

The tiger-cat is about the bigness of a bull-dog, with short legs, and a truss body, shaped much like a mastiff. Dampier, Voyages, an. 1676.

truss-beam (trus'bēm), n. A wooden beam reinforced by a tie-rod, or a compound wooden beam composed of two or more wooden members and reinforced by means of a tie-rod, or a built-up beam of iron arranged in the form of a truss. The most simple form is a single piece of timber having an iron tie-rod on the under side secured at each end of the beam, serving to resist the strain of tension on the under side of the beam when carrying a load. The lower beams of a railroad passenger-car are a good example. Another and less common form is a wooden beam having cast-iron struts to resist the strain of compression. Several beams united and reinforced by a tie-rod may form a compound truss-beam. Iron truss-beams have usually only tie-rods of wrought-iron, with sometimes box-beams for the upper chord. Truss-beams are used in car-building, in roofs of all kinds, and for short bridges. See beam, truss, and bridge!.

truss-block (trus'blok), n. A block between a truss-rod and the compression-member of a trussed beam. It keeps the two at their proper distance apart.

truss-bridge (trus'brīj), n. A bridge which depends for its stability upon an application of the principle of the truss. See bridge!.

trussed (trust), a. [<truss + -ed.] 1. Provided with some form of truss: as, a trussed roof; a trussed beam.—2. In her., same as *close*2, 10 (f): used of a bird.—Trussed-arch bridge. See bridge!.—Trussed girder. See *girder*1, 2. trussel1+ (trus'el), n. [ME. trussel, <OF. trousse, F. trousseau, a bundle, dim. of trousse, a bundle: see truss, and cf. trousseau.] A bundle.

trussel2 (trus'l), n. Same as *tristle*1.

trusseltree (trus'l-trē), n. Same as *tristle*tree.

trusser (trus'er), n. One who or that which trusses.

Hay and straw trussers. The Engineer, LXVII. 292.

trusset, n. pl. See truss, 6.

truss-hoop (trus'hōp), n. In coopering, a temporary hoop which may be placed around a barrel and tightened, to draw the staves snugly together or to hold them in position while one that has become broken or decayed is being replaced. E. H. Knight.

trussing (trus'ing), n. [Verbal n. of truss, v.] In building, the timbers, etc., which form a truss.

—Diagonal trussing, in ship-building, a particular method of binding a vessel internally or externally, or both, by means of a series of wooden or iron braces laid diagonally on the framing from one end of the ship to the other.

trussing-bed1 (trus'ing-bed), n. A bed which could be packed, as in a chest, for traveling. Halliwell.

trussing-machine (trus'ing-ma-shēn'), n. In coopering, a machine for forcing truss-hoops upon casks. E. H. Knight.

truss-piece (trus'pēs), n. A filling piece between the compartments of a framed truss. E. H. Knight.

truss-plank (trus'plangk), n. In a railway passenger-car, a wide piece of timber fastened on the inside of the car to the posts of the frame directly above the sills.

truss-rod (trus'rod), n. A tie-rod fastened to the ends of a beam and bearing against a king-post at the middle, or against queen-posts or truss-blocks between the rod and the beam at intermediate points. It serves to resist deflection of the beam.

truss-tackle (trus'tak'l), n. A tackle formerly used with rope trusses for lower yards to truss the yard close in to the mast.

trust1 (trust), n. and a. [Also, in a sense now differentiated, tryst, q. v.; < ME. trust, trost, also trist, tryst, trōt; not found in AS., and in part of Scand. origin]; = OFries. trāst, comfort, = MD. D. troost, comfort, consolation, = MLG. trōst, consolation, confidence, trust, = OHG. MHG. trōst, G. trost, trust, help, protection, = Goth. trausti, covenant, treaty, = Icel. traust, trust, protection, shelter, confidence, reliance, = Sw. Dan. trōst, comfort, consolation; cf. OS. getrōst, a following, ML. trustis, a pledge, a following; Icel. traustr, adj., safe, strong, firm; akin to AS. trēowe, etc., true, trēowian, believe, trōw, from the Teut. tru-*: see true, *trōw*1.] I. n. 1. Reliance on the veracity, integrity, justice, friendship, or other virtue or sound principle of another; a firm reliance on promises or on laws or principles; confidence; belief.

Always han fulle trust and beleve in God oure Sovreyn Lord. Mandeville, Travels, p. 167.

Gramercy! for on you is al my trust.

Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 1305.

I hope a true and plain relation of my misfortunes may be of use and warning to credulous maids, never to put too much trust in deceitful men.

Swift, Story of the Injured Lady.

There did not seem a sufficient number of men worthy of trust to assist the king with their councils, or fill with any degree of dignity the places that were vacant.

Bruce, Source of the Nile, II. 121.

2. Confident expectation; assured anticipation; dependence upon something future or contingent as if present or actual; hope.

To desperation turn my trust and hope!

Shak., Hamlet, iii. 2. 228.

His trust was with th' Eternal to be deem'd Equal in strength.

Milton, P. L., li. 46.

Sustained and soothed By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave, Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Bryant, Thanatopsis.

3. That on which one relies or in which he confides; ground of reliance, confidence, or hope.

Blessed is that man that maketh the Lord his trust.

Ps. xl. 4.

Who in the fear of God didst bear The sword of power, a nation's trust.

Bryant, Abraham Lincoln.

4. Credit. (a) Mere reliance on the character or reputation of a person or thing, without investigation or evidence: preceded by on: as, to take opinions or statements on trust.

For we live in an age so sceptical that, as it determines little, so it takes nothing from antiquity on trust.

Dryden, Def. of Epil. to 2d pt. Conq. of Granada.

Some . . . taking things upon trust, misemploy their power of assent by lazily enslaving their minds to the dictates and dominion of others.

Locke, Human Understanding, I. iv. § 22.

(b) Confidence in the ability and intention of one; does not pay ready money to pay at some definite or definite time in the future: as, to buy or sell on trust.

Ey'n such is time; which takes in trust.

Our youth, our joys, our all we have!

And pays us nought but age and dust.

Raleigh, Ellis's Spec. of Early Eng. Poetry, II. 1.

I fear you must be forced, like the rest of your sister, to run in trust, and pay for it out of your wages.

Swift, Advice to Servants (Waiting-Ma).

5. In law: (a) A confidence reposed in a person by making him the nominal owner of property which he is to hold, use, or dispose of to the benefit of another. (b) The right on the part of such other to enjoy the use or the product or to require a disposal of the property for his benefit. (c) The relation between persons and property which arises when the legal ownership is given to one person, called the trustee and the beneficial enjoyment or advantages ownership are given or reserved to another, i. e. cestui que trust or beneficiary. Property is sometimes said to be held in trust when the possession of it is entrusted to one person while another remains both legal and beneficial owner; but this is not technically a trust although the person so entrusted in some respects may be held to the same duty and accountability as a trustee and is sometimes spoken of as such.

The fictitious entities characterised by the two abstract terms trust and condition are not subalternate but separate. To speak with perfect precision, we should say that he who is invested with a trust is, on that account, spoken of as being invested with a condition: viz. condition of a trustee.

Bentham, Intro. to Morals and Legislation, xvi. 26, n.

6. That which is committed or intrusted to one, as for safe-keeping or use. (a) That which has been committed to one's care for profitable use or safe-keeping, of which an account must be rendered.

Although the advantages one man possesseth more than another may be called his property with respect to other men, yet with respect to God they are only a trust. See the English doctrine that all power is a trust for public good (was) . . . making rapid progress.

Macaulay, Walpole's Letters.

Public office is a public trust.

Dorman B. Eaton, in Cyc. Polit. Science, I. 479 (18).

(b) Something confided to one's faith; a charge given received in confidence; something which one is bound to do and in honor to keep inviolate; a duty incumbent on one.

To violate the sacred trust of silence

Deposited within thee. Milton, S. A., I. 1.

Humility obliges no Man to desert his Trust, to throw up his Privilege, and prove false to his Character.

"If men accept trusts they must fulfill them, they deserve the master of the house. Thackeray, Philip.

7. Specifically, in mod. com. usage, an organization for the control of several corporations under one direction by the device of a transfer of the stockholders in each corporation of at least a majority of the stock to a central committee board of trustees, who issue in return to stockholders respectively certificates showing in effect that, although they have parted with their stock and the consequent voting power they are still entitled to dividends or to share the profits—the object being to enable the trustees to elect directors in all the corporations to control and suspend at pleasure the work any, and thus to economize expenses, regulate production, and defeat competition. In a sense the term is applied to any combination of establishments in the same line of business for securing same ends by holding the individual interests of each servient to a common authority for the common interest of all. It is against public policy for a stockholder to vest himself of his voting power; hence such a transfer of stock if made is revocable at the pleasure of the maker. So far as the object of such a combination is shown to be the control of prices and the prevention of competition in the necessities or conveniences of life, it is held a criminal act upon the principles which rendered engrossing and forestalling punishable; and a corporation which corporate act surrenders its powers to the control of trust thereby affords ground for a forfeiture of its charter by the state.

8. The state of being confided in and relied on; the state of one to whom something is intrusted.

I do profess to be no less than I seem; to serve him truly that will put me in trust.

Shak., Lear, i. 4.

It seems when he was deputy in Ireland, not long before, he had been much wronged by one he left in trust with his affairs.

Evelyn, Diary, Oct. 27, 16.

9. The state of being confided to another's care or guard; charge.

His seal'd commission, left in trust with me,

Both speak sufficiently he's gone to travel.

Shak., Pericles, i. 3.

10. Keeping; care.

That which is committed to thy trust. 1 Tim. vi.

11+. Trustworthiness.

A man he is of honesty and trust.

Shak., Othello, I. 3. 2.

in suits which a man doth not well understand, it is good refer them to some friend of trust and judgment.
Bacon, Sultors (ed. 1837).

There is not
In any court of Christendom a man
For quality or trust more absolute.
Ford, Love's Sacrifice, i. 2.

active or special trust (in Scots law called accessory trust), a trust in which the trustee is clothed with some special power of disposition or management which cannot properly exercised without his having the legal estate or right of actual possession; as distinguished from a simple trust, naked trust, or passive trust (in Scots law called proprietary trust), where the trustee is intended to be merely a figurehead to hold the apparent title, leaving the use or control to the beneficiary. Naked or passive trusts in land are now generally superseded by the rule (introduced originally by the statute of uses (see use), and extended in the United States by statutes of trusts) that, when a person attempts to create such a trust, no estate vests in the trustee, but the entire and absolute estate vests in the intended beneficiary. — Breach of trust. See breach.

Charitable Trusts Acts. See charitable. — Constructive trust, the legal relation similar to an express trust which arises upon circumstances which ought a equity to be dealt with as if there were a trust, irrespective of whether one was intended or not: thus, where a guardian transfers property of the ward without receiving an equivalent, the person receiving it may be made accountable as holding in trust for the ward by construction of law, irrespective of whether he intended to receive it for the ward's benefit or not. — Declaration of trust. See declaration. — Deed of trust. See deed. — Executed trust. (a) Technically, an express trust the objects and administration of which are so fully designated as to require no further act on the part of the grantor of the trust to define the duty of the trustee, as distinguished from an executory trust, or one in which the instrument of creation reserves the declaration of the uses or some part thereof for further instructions. (b) A trust is also said to be executed when the trustee has performed his entire duty. (c) When the instrument creating a trust in land has the effect by virtue of the statute of uses of vesting the entire estate in the intended beneficiary, the trust is said to be executed by the statute. — Express trust, a trust which is created or declared in express terms, and usually, but not always, in writing, as distinguished from an implied trust, or one the existence of which is inferred from the conduct of the parties or the circumstances of the case. The phrase implied trust is sometimes loosely, but not improperly, applied to those constructive trusts in which there may be circumstances indicating that perhaps the parties intended a trust rather than a fraud. — Implied trust. See express trust. — In trust, as a trust; as a charge; for safe-keeping, or for the benefit of another upon whom account is due. — Loan and trust company. See company. — Naked trust, a nominal or ostensible trust; a trust in which the trustee is not clothed with the right of possession or control. By the statute of uses, such trusts in land are executed, that is to say, the legal title is declared by law to be in the beneficiary, who has the right of possession and control, notwithstanding the contrary intent of the instrument creating the trust. — On trust, on credit; without present payment or security for payment: as, to buy on trust; to conduct one's business on trust. — Passive trust. See active trust. — Private trusts. See private. — Proprietary trust. See active trust. — Public trust. See private. — Resulting trust, a trust which is conclusively implied by rules of law from given circumstances; more specifically, that species of constructive trust which arises in favor of one who pays the price for real property on its conveyance to another. When one person obtained title to land for a consideration paid by another, the courts of chancery thus held the former to be a trustee of the property for the latter. By statute in many of the United States this result is precluded, except where the person paying is ignorant that the title is so taken, or where the claim to retain the property is made by his creditors. — Spiritual trust. See spiritual. — Spender's trust, a trust authorizing the trustee to pay the income for life to one person, the principal being given over to another on his death; so called under systems of law, as in Pennsylvania, which protect such income against claims of creditors. — To run in trust, to run in debt; get credit. Webster. — Trust certificate, one of the certificates issued by the committee of trustees formed for the control of several corporations, showing the interest on profits accepted by one who was a stockholder in one of such corporations, upon surrendering his stock. See def. 7. — Trust deed, a conveyance in trust. More specifically — (a) A deed by a debtor conveying property to a person as trustee for payment of his debts. (b) A deed conveying property to a creditor in trust to sell and pay himself and restore the residue: a kind of mortgage. — Trust estate, an estate under the management of a trustee or trustees; or an estate given to be held in trust. — Trust ex maleficio, any constructive trust arising by reason of wrong doing or intentional fraud on the part of the person charged as trustee, as where an attorney obtains title to his client's property in violation of duty. — Syn. 1 and 2. Faith, credence, assurance, dependence, expectation.

II. a. Held in trust: as, trust property; trust money.

trust'. An obsolete spelling of trussed, preterit and past participle of trust.

trustee (trus-tē), n. [< *trust*¹ + -ee¹.] 1. A person to whom property or funds have been committed in the belief and trust that he will hold and apply the same for the benefit of those who are entitled, according to an expressed intention, either by the parties themselves, or by the deed, will, settlement, or arrangement of another; also, by extension, a person held accountable as if he were expressly a trustee in law. Compare guardian, 2.

I have made over all my Wealth to these Honest Gentlemen; they are my Trustees.
Etherege, Love in a Tub, Epil.

Philip's mother's trustee was answerable to Philip for his property. Thackeray, Philip, xvi.

Their [the clergy's] gigantic wealth was in a great degree due to the legacies of those who regarded them as the trustees of the poor. Lecky, Europ. Morals, II. 89.

2. In the United States, a person in whose hands the effects of another are attached in a trustee process (see the phrase below). — Trustee Churches Act. See church. — Trustee of bankrupt's estate. Same as assignee in bankruptcy (which see, under assignee). — Trustee process, a species of attachment of rights of action of a debtor or property belonging to him in the hands of a third person, by making the debtor to him or the third person, as the case may be, a party to the proceedings, so as to charge him with the money or the property as a trust for the attaching creditor of the debtor (or equivalent to the process known in English law as foreign attachment). It is called trustee process in some jurisdictions, as distinguishing it from attachments which go to the length of taking the said property or fund into the actual custody of the law by seizure.

trustee (trus-tē), v. t. [< trustee, n.] To attach by a trustee process. See trustee, n., 3.

trusteeship (trus-tē'ship), n. [< trustee + -ship.] The office or functions of a trustee.

truster (trus'tēr), n. [< *trust*¹ + -er¹.] 1. One who trusts or relies, or who accepts a thing as true; a believer.

Nor shall you do mine ear that violence
To make it truster of your own report Against yourself. Shak., Hamlet, i. 2. 172.

2. One who trusts or gives credit; a creditor.

Bankrupts, hold fast;
Rather than render back, out with your knives,
And cut your trusters' throats!
Shak., T. of A., iv. 1. 10.

3. In Scots law, one who grants a trust deed: the correlative of trustee.

trustful (trus'tfūl), a. [< *trust*¹ + -ful.] 1. Full of trust; confiding: as, a person of a trustful disposition.

Consider, again, how much that is loveable and praise-worthy and energetic for good in individuals springs from the trustful and affectionate element in our nature.
H. N. Ozernham, Short Studies, p. 263.

2t. Worthy of trust; faithful; trusty. Stanishurst.

Shak., All's Well, iii. 6. 16.

II. n.; pl. trusties (-tiz). A trusty person; specifically, a well-behaved and trustworthy convict to whom special privileges are granted.

By far the greater number of criminals confined in the jails of the far West are there for a class of offenses peculiar to the country. They are men dangerous in one direction, perhaps, but generally not depraved. The trusties are often domesticated upon ranches near the town, and apparently are unwatched, and on the best of terms with the ranchman's family. The Century, XXXVII. 448.

trut, interj. [ME. trut, also ptrupt, ptrot, < OF. trut, an interj. of contempt. Cf. tut.] An interjection of contempt. Prompt. Parv., p. 415.

truth (trōth), n. [Also, in a form now differentiated, troth, q. v.; < ME. truthe, treuthe, treuthe, treuwelthe, treuthe, treowthe, etc., also trouthe, trouthe, < AS. trēowthu, trēowth (trēowth, trēowth) (= OHG. triuwida*, in comp., = Icel. trýggth), truth, faith; with formative -th, < trōwe, true; see true.] 1. The state or character of being true; truthness. (a) Conformity of thought with fact; conformity of a judgment, statement, or belief with the reality; exact correspondence of subjective and objective relations.

All admit that by truth is understood a harmony, an agreement, a correspondence between our thought and that which we think about. This definition we owe to the schoolmen. "Veritas intellectus," says Aquinas, "est adæquatio intellectus et rei, secundum quod intellectus dicit esse quod est, vel non esse quod non est."

Sir W. Hamilton, Logic, xxvii.

In common life we call truth the agreement between an object and our conception of the object. We thus presuppose an object to which our conception must conform. In the philosophical sense of the word, on the other hand, truth may be described, in a general and one-sided way, as the agreement of the subject-matter of thought with itself.

Hegel, Logic (tr. by Wallace), p. 43.

(b) The state of being made true or exact; exact conformity to a model, rule, or plan; accuracy of adjustment; exact adaptation.

Ploughs, to go true, depend much on the truth of the iron-work.
Mortimer, Husbandry.

Most gun-stocks are twisted over—that is to say, the toe of the butt is more out of truth with the barrels than the heel.
W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 432.

(c) In the fine arts, the proper and correct representation of any object in nature, or of whatever subject may be under treatment; specifically, in arch., avoidance of deceptions in construction or decoration, as of non-concordance of apparent and real structure, or of imitation of stone or marble in paint or plaster.

The agony of the Laocoon, the action of the Discobolus, the upspringing of the Mercury, are all apparently real in their action by the innate truth of their conformation. . . . Truth is therefore the highest quality in Art.

Fairholt, Dict. Terms of Art.

In truth and skill of modelling even the sculptures of Chares and St. Denis, which are a century earlier in date, surpass those of Wells.

C. H. Moore, Gothic Architecture, p. 286.

(d) Habitual disposition to speak only what is true; veracity; purity from falsehood; truthfulness; sincerity; uprightness; honesty: as, a man of truth.

For as long as zee ben bounden to gedere in places—that is to seyne, in Love, in Trouthe, and in gode Accord—no man schalle ben of powere to greve zou.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 229.

(e) Disposition to be faithful; fidelity; constancy.

Long since we were resolved of your truth.

Shak., I Hen. VI., iii. 4. 20.

Now I shall try thy truth. If thou dost love me, Thou weigh'st not any thing compar'd with me.

Beau. and Fl., Maid's Tragedy, ii. 1.

Alas! they had been friends in youth;
But whispering tongues can poison truth.

Coleridge, Christabel, ii.

(f) The state of not being counterfeited or adulterated; genuineness; purity.

The truth of thy love to me.

Shak., As you Like it, i. 2. 13.

2. That which is true. (a) Fact; reality; verity: as, a lover of truth: often personified.

"Sygrem," he said, "to yow I will not lyeve,
I shall yow telle the truth."

Generydes (E. E. T. S.), i. 2384.

Deame thee best in every doute
Tyl the trouthe be tryed oute.

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 332.

You peradventure think aptness and ableness all one; whereas the truth is that, had we kept our first ableness, grace should not need. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v., App. 1.

For my mouth shall speak truth.
Prov. viii. 7.

For truth is truth

To the end of reckoning. Shak., M. for M., v. 1. 45.

Oh, Truth, thou art a mighty conqueress!

Fletcher (and another), Queen of Corinth, iv. 3.

Truth is the most unbending and uncompliable, the most necessary, firm, immutable, and adamant thing in the world.
Cudworth, Morality, IV. v. § 3.

Kant regards it as a duty owed to oneself to speak the truth, because "a lie is an abandonment or, as it were, annihilation of the dignity of man."

H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 292.

(b) A verified fact; a true statement or proposition; an established principle, fixed law, or the like.

Fundamental truths. . . like the lights of heaven, are not only beautiful and entertaining in themselves, but give light and evidence to other things that without them could not be seen.

Locke, Conduct of the Understanding, § 43.

(c) That which is righteous or in accordance with the divine standard.

He that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God.
John iii. 21.

3†. Faith pledged; pledge; troth. See troth.

I'll give thee the truth of my right hand;

The truth of it I'll freely give.

Young, Beichan and Susie Pye (Child's Ballads, IV. 4).

Well, Time is the old justice that examines all such ofenders, and let Time try. Shak., As you Like it, IV. 1. 204.

3. Naut., to lie to in a gale under storm-sails so is to keep a ship's bow to the sea.

Down with the topmast: yare! lower, lower! Bring her to try with main course.

Shak., Tempest, I. 1. 37.

When the barke had way, we cut the hawser, and so gate the sea to our friend, and tryed out at that day with our maine corse.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 277.

To try back. (a) To go back, as in search of a road that one has missed; revert, as in conversation, in order to recover some point that one has missed; hark back.

She was marvellously quick to discover that she was astay and try back.

Lever, Davenport Dunn, XI.

The leading hounds . . . are trying back.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, I. 7.

Would it not be well then to try back? to bear in mind, as the first and most fundamental truth of all, that meat is suitable for grown men, that milk is suitable for babes?

Nineteenth Century, XXII. 812.

6) In angling, to fish again over a pool or stream where the fish have refused to bite before, as with a different sort of flies, from another direction, with regard to the wind or sun, etc. also used transitively: as, to try back the water. To try out. (a) To separate, as fat or grease from a substance roasted, boiled or steamed as the grease tried out of lard in cooking. Hence:—(b) To train up, or try out, as sweat: as the perspiration is trying out of him. [Low. New Eng.] Trying up, in joinery, the operation of taking off a shaving extending the entire length of the stuff. Trying-up machine, a planing-machine used for trying up scantling.—Syn. 1. To seek, esso, strive.

try (tri), v. [try, v.] 1. The act of trying;

a trial; experiment; effort.

This breaking of his has been but a try for his friends.

Shak., T. of A., v. 1. 11.

Don't give it up yet; . . . let's have a try for him.

Mrs. Gaskell, Mary Barton, xxvii.

The rock lies within a few feet of the surface, and any buildings that may have existed upon it have totally disappeared. A fresh try was made for tombs in a large field to the north of the same road.

Amer. Jour. Archaeol., VI. 358.

2. In foot-ball, in the Rugby game, the right to carry the ball in front of the goal and try to kick a goal. When goals are equal, the game is decided by the majority of tries.—3. A sieve; riddle; screen. [Prov. Eng.]

They will not pass through the holes of the sieve, ruddle, or try, if they be narrow.

Holland, Tr. of Plutarch, p. 86. (Trench.)

tryable, a. See triable.

try-cock (tri'kok), n. A gage-cock.

tryet, v. An obsolete spelling of try.

tryet, a. [ME. trie, trye, < OF. trié, pp. of trier, pick, choose: see try, v.] Choice; select; approved; excellent.

Sugre that is so trye.

Chaucer, Sir Thopas, l. 145.

Those hands of gold,

And eke her feete, those feete of silver trye.

Spenser, F. Q., V. II. 26.

tryed, a. An obsolete spelling of tried.

*Trygon*¹ (tri'gon), n. [NL. (Geoffroy St. Hilaire, 1809, from Adanson's manuscript), < L. trygon,

< Gr. τρυγών, a sting-ray: said to be so named from the expansive pectoral fins, likened to a dove's wings; a transferred use of τρυγών, a dove. Compare similar use of angel-fish, and see *Trygon*².] In ichth., a genus of rays, giving name to the family Trygonidae; the sting-rays, having the long slender lash-like tail armed with a strong serrated spine near the base. These rays attain a large size and abound in warm seas. The genus is also called Dasybatus (Walbaum, 1793), a name varying to Dasyatis (Rafinesque, 1810), Dasybatis (Garman), and Dasybatis (Jordan). See cut under sting-ray.

*Trygon*² (tri'gon), n. [NL., < Gr. τρυγών, a dove.] In ornith., a monotypic genus of Papuan pigeons, based by Hombron and Jacquinot in 1846 (in the form Trygon) upon T. terrestris, and subsequently variously applied.

Trygonidae (tri-gon'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Trygon

+ -idae.] A family of batoid elasmobranchiate fishes, whose typical genus is Trygon; the sting-rays. The tail is armed with a sharp serrated spine or spines capable of inflicting a severe wound.

The genera are about 10 and the species 50 in number;

they are ovoviviparous, and found in most warm seas,

some of them reaching comparatively high latitudes, and others inhabiting fresh waters of Central and South America. The family is also called Dasybatidae. See Trygon, and cut under sting-ray.

try-house (tri'hous), n. A building or shed in which oil is extracted from blubber, or in which lard or the like is rendered.

trying (tri'ing), p. a. [Ppr. of try, v.] Of a kind to test severely or thoroughly; difficult;

severe: as, a trying ordeal; trying circumstances; a color trying to one's complexion.

He was restless as well as idle, a combination which more trying to the peace of your housemates than any other can be.

Mrs. Olyphant, Poor Gentleman, I.

trying-plane (tri'ing-plān), n. In joinery,

a plane, used after the jack-plane, for taking off a shaving the whole length of the stuff, which operation is called trying up. See *plane*².

trying-square (tri'ing-skwar), n. Same as try- square. E. H. Knight.

tryma (tri'mā), n.; pl. trymata (-mā-tā). [NL.,

< Gr. τρυμα, τρυμν, a hole, < τρύειν, rub.] In bot., a drupe or drupaceous nut with a fleshy exocarp which is at length dehiscent or otherwise, as in the walnut and hickory-nut. It may be accurately defined as a one-seeded fruit with a well-defined stony endocarp, and with the outer part of the carp fleshy, leathery, or fibrous; it is distinguished from the drupe by being derived from an inferior instead of a superior ovary.

Buff-breasted Sandpiper (Tryngites rufescens).

trynet, a. An old spelling of *trine*³.

Tryngites (trin-jit'ez), n. [NL. (Cabanis, 1856),

< Gr. τρυγγας, a bird so called by Aristotle, a sandpiper, + -ites. Cf. Tringa.] A genus of small tattlers, of the family Scotopaciidae; the marble-winged sandpipers. They resemble true sandpipers very closely, but are totanin, not tringine; the bill is short and extremely slender; the toes are cleft to the base, or with a mere trace of webbing; the tail is not barred, and the flight-feathers have a peculiar tracery, like the veining of marble, of black on a pearly-white ground.

T. rufescens (or subruficollis) is the buff-breasted sandpiper of both Americas, very wide-ranging, and breeding in high latitudes; it is about 8 inches long and 16 in extent of wings. This bird is a near relative of Bartram's sandpiper among North American forms, and is still more closely related to certain Polynesian sandpipers. See cut in preceding column.

Trypanosoma (trip'a-nō-sō'mā), n. [Gr. τρι- παινον, a borer, + σώμα, body.] A genus of flagellate infusorians, typical of the family Trypano- somatidae. T. sanguinis, also called Undulina ranarum, occurs in the blood of amphibians.

Trypanosomata (trip'a-nō-sō'mā-tā), n. pl.

[NL., neut. pl. of trypanosomatus; see trypano- somatous.] An order of infusorial animalcules, formed for the reception of the Trypanoso- matidae (which see).

Trypanosomatidae (trip'a-nō-sō-mat'i-dē), n. pl.

[NL., < Trypanosomata + -idae.] The only family of Trypanosomata. These animals are free-swimming, of compressed form, with one side produced as a thin undulating frill, the anterior end sometimes with a flagellate appendage, but without distinct oral aperture.

trypanosomatous (trip'a-nō-sōm'ā-tus), a.

[< NL. trypanosomatus, < Gr. τριπαινον, a borer, auger (see trepan), + σώμα, body.] Of or pertaining to the Trypanosomata.

Trypanostoma (trip'a-nōs'tō-mā), n. [NL.,

< Gr. τριπαινον, a borer, + στόμα, mouth.] A genus of univalves: same as Pleurocera.

τρυπητής, a borer, < τρυπών, bore: see *trepan*¹.]

A notable genus of flies, typical of the family

Trypetidae, of medium size, and yellowish-gray or greenish-yellow in color, with banded, spotted,

Trypoxylon (tri-pok'si-lon), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1804), < Gr. τρύπων, bore, + ξύλον, wood.] A genus of fossorial hymenopterous insects, of the family Crabronidae, composed of small solitary wasps having the eyes deeply emarginate within, the abdomen long and clavate, the marginal cell long, pointed at the apex, and the neurotation of the posterior wings complete. They are noted for adapting the old nests of other species to their own use. T. albilaris is found abundantly in the old cells of wasps of the genus Pelopon in the United States. Three European and fourteen North American species are known.

trypsin (trip'sin), n. [Prob. for tripsine, so called because it was first obtained by rubbing down the pancreas with glycerin; < Gr. τρῑψις, a rubbing (< τρῑβειν, rub), + -in.] The proteolytic ferment which is the active principle of the pancreatic fluid; pancreatin. It is active in neutral or alkaline solutions, and not only produces peptones from the proteid matter of the food, but further converts a portion of the peptones into leucin and tyrosin.

trypsinogen (trip-sin'ō-jen), n. [trypsin + -gen.] A granular substance in the cells of the pancreas which is the antecedent of trypsin.

tryptic (trip'tik), a. [trypsin (trypt-) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to trypsin; as, tryptic action.

tryptone (trip'ton), n. [trypt-ic + -one.] A substance formed by the action of pancreatic juice on proteids.

trysail (tri'sāl or tri'sl), n. A fore-and-aft sail set with a gaff and sometimes with a boom on the foremast and mainmast of ships, or on a small mast called a trysail-mast. See mast.¹

try-square (tri'skwār), n. A carpenter's square. Also trial-square and trying-square. See square.¹, 5.

tryst (trist), v. [ME. trist, tryst, a variant of trust: see trust.¹ The present spelling tryst instead of trist is due to Scotch use.] 1. Same as trust.¹, in various senses.—2. An appointment to meet; an appointed meeting; as, to keep tryst; to break tryst.

There was a knight and a lady bright

Had a true tryst at the broom.

The Broomfield Hill (Child's Ballads, I. 131).

Wae's me for the time, Willie,

That our first tryst was set!

Motherwell, My Heid is Like to Rend, Willie.

3. An appointed place of meeting; a rendezvous.

Lo, holde the at thy tryste cloos, and I

Shal wel the deere unto thy bowre dyve.

Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 1534.

4. An appointed meeting for the exchange of commodities; a market: as, Falkirk tryst (a noted horse- and cattle-market held at Falkirk in Scotland).

I neither dought to buy nor sell,

At fair or tryst where I may be.

Thomas the Rhymer (Child's Ballads, I. 112).

To bide tryst, to wait at the appointed time and place to meet one according to engagement or agreement.

"You walk late," said I . . . "I bide tryste," was the reply, "and so, I think, do you, Mr. Osbaldistone."

Scott, Rob Roy, xxi.

tryst (trist), v. [ME. tristen, trysten; var. of trust.¹ Cf. tryst, n.] I. trans. 1. Same as trust.¹, in various senses.—2. To make an appointment to meet at a given time and place; engage to meet.

Sae cunningly's I trysted her

Unto yon shade o' broom.

William Guessem (Child's Ballads, III. 51).

Why did ye tryst me here?

The Hivemane Chiel (Child's Ballads, VIII. 238).

II. intrans. To agree to meet at any particular time or place. [Scotch.]

trystell-tree, n. [Formerly also tristil; < trystell* for tryster.² + tree.] A tree at which a meeting is appointed.

Welcome be thou, gentill knight,

Under my trystell tree.

Lytell Geste of Robyn Hode (Child's Ballads, V. 92).

tryster.¹ (tris'tēr), n. [tryst + -er.] 1. One who trysts; one who sets or makes a tryst; one who fixes a time and place of meeting.—2. One who attends a tryst or market.

tryster.², n. [ME. tryster, trister, tristre, tryster, tristur; < OF. tristre, perhaps a var. of tertre, a piece of ground, a mound; confused in ME. with tryst.] An appointed place; a station; a rendezvous.

Thenne watz he went, or he wyst, to a wale tryster.

Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), i. 1712.

trystily, adv. A Middle English form of trustily.

tsar, tsarevitch, etc. See czar, czarevitch, etc.

tsatlee (tsat'lē), n. [Chinese Tsat-li, the name of a place noted for the production of this kind of silk, < tsat, a dialectal form of ts'ih, seven, + li, a mile.] A variety of Chinese raw silk, said to be the finest known.

tscheffkinite (chēf'kin-it), n. [Named from Gen. Tscheffkin, chief of the Mining Department of Russia.] A rare mineral occurring in massive forms of a velvet-black color. It is a silicate containing titanium, iron, thorium, cerium, and other elements; its exact composition is doubtful.

tschermigite (chēr'mi-git), n. Same as ammonialum.

Tschudi, Tschudic. See Chudi, Chudic.

Tsech, n. See Czech.

tse-hong (tse'hong), n. [Chinese, < tse, tsz', beautiful, fascinating, + hong, hung, red.] A purplish-red pigment, consisting of white lead with alumina, ferric oxid, and silica, used by the Chinese for painting on porcelain.

tsetse (tset'se), n. [Also tsetze, tsetze, tsetze; South African.] An African dipterous insect, of the family Stomoxys and genus Glossina, G. morsitans, whose bite is often fatal to some animals, as horses, cattle, and dogs.

Tsetse (Glossina morsitans), four times natural size.

tsetse-fly (tset'se-flī), n. The tsetse.

tsien (chen), n. See cash.³, 1.

T-square (tē'skwār), n. A ruler or guide used in mechanical and architectural drawing. It consists of two wooden arms joined together at right angles like the letter T, the shorter arm, called the helve, projecting so that it can slide along the edge of the drawing-table, which serves as a guide, and the longer arm or blade serving as a ruler. Some squares have additional members, in the form of a shifting helve or a pivoted tractor, for adjusting the blade at different angles on the drawing-table. See square.¹, 5.

tsuba (tsū'bā), n. [Jap.] The guard of a Japanese sword. It is a flat disk of metal, of round or irregular form, and is typically treated as an independent dent work of art, being in general pierced with fretwork decorated with low relief, engraving, damasking, etc., like the.

Tsuga (tsū'gā), n. [NL. (Carrière, 1855), < Jap. tsuga, the name of T. Araragi, lit. 'yew-leaved' or 'evergreen'.] 1. A genus of coniferous trees, of the tribe Abietineæ, including the hemlocks, and intermediate between Picea, the spruce, and Abies, the fir. Its staminate flowers and its seemingly two-ranked flat linear leaves resemble those of Abies, but it agrees with Picea instead in its persistent petiole-bases and in its reflexed cones with persistent scales. The 6 species are evergreens with slender flat or often pendulous branchlets, and narrowly linear leaves flat above (convex or keeled in T. Pattoniana), and spirally inserted, but spreading in two ranks. The main branches are mostly horizontal, and are irregularly inserted, not whorled as in the fir and spruce. They are tall trees (excepting T. Caroliniana), reaching 80 to 100 feet high, with large cylindrical trunks and thick brown bark, which deep-red within. The cones are small and brown, an inch or less long, or in T. Pattoniana cylindrical and 2 or 3 inches long; in this and in T. Mertensiana they are bright purple until ripe. Two species are found on the Atlantic and 2 on the Pacific side of North America, and 2 in Alaska. In each case one of the two species is interior, alpine, and more or less local, while the other is more wide-spread and approaches the coast. T. Canadensis, the hemlock of the Alleghany range, extending south to Alabama, and forming the larger part of the dense forests northward. Its trunk is often 3, sometimes 6, feet in diameter, forming in the oldest trees a nearly uniform shaft for two thirds of its length. It furnishes the principal tan-bark of the eastern United States, and a coarse wood, the red and the white hemlock of lumbermen. It is the source of hemlock-pitch, used in stimulating plasters, and of a fluid extract sometimes used as an astringent. It is now planted for hedges and to ornament lawns in the eastern States, also in Europe and Australia, and is much admired in its earlier growth for its delicate spray with light-green leaves silvery beneath, and hung with small oval brown cones about the ends of the branches. (See cut under imbricat.) In middle life the long-persistent dead lower branch often render it unsightly, and impair the value of the wood. T. Caroliniana is the Carolina hemlock, a small and rare tree of dry rocky ridges in the Carolinas, having larger, glossier, blunter leaves, and larger cones with widely spreading scales. T. Mertensiana, the western hemlock, forms large forests in Oregon, extending to Montana in Alaska. It yields the principal tanning-material of the northwestern States and a coarse inferior lumber; it is the eastern species in its size, being sometimes 10 feet high and 12 feet in diameter. T. Pattoniana, the pine spruce, occurring locally from British Columbia, California, sometimes 7 feet in diameter, peculiar in the deflexed base of its spreading branches and its finer saw wood, is exceptional in the genus in its scattered irregular leaves, with the persistent petiole-base large prominent, two-lobed pollen-grains like those of pine and large leather-brown cones with their scales reflex. It is therefore separated by Lemmon (1890) as a new Heptaplexis. T. Araragi (T. Sieboldii) of Japan, the original species, forms large forests on Fusi-yama and Mt.

Branch with Cones of Hemlock-spruce (Tsuga Canadensis).

mountains, is planted about temples, and yields a fine-grained yellowish timber, much used by the Japanese and Chinese for turning and for furniture. Its variety nana, dwarf species 2 or 3 feet high, known as fine tsuga, is here a favorite garden shrub. T. densata (T. Brunsfordensis), the tang-sung of Bhutan—a tall tree with graceful working-branches, used for incense by the Hindus—is next the handsomest forest-trees of the Himalayas, often rising to from 6 to 8 feet in diameter.

2. [L. c.] A tree of this genus.

tsun (tsun), n. [Chinese.] An inch, being the tenth part of a Chinese chih or foot.

tsung-tuh (tsung' tu'), n. sing. and pl. [Chinese, tsung, general, + tuh, overseer.] The highest provincial officer in China; a viceroy or governor-general, having the general control of all civil and military affairs of one or more provinces, and subject only to the throne. The eighteen provinces of China proper are governed by eight tsung-tuh or viceroys, and sixteen tutal or governors.

tart, n. See toart.

latera (tō-a-tā' rā), n. The gigantic lizard of New Zealand, Hatteria (or Sphenodon) punctata. See cut under Hatteria.

tuath (tū'ath), n. [Ir. tuath, people: see Dutch.] An Irish territorial division, or an association of persons. See the quotation.

The term Tuath was at the same time genealogical and geographical, having been applied to the people occupying a district which had complete political and legal administration, a chief or Rí, and could bring into the field a battalion of seven hundred men. The word was also applied, however, to a larger division, consisting of three or four, or even more, Tuaths, called a Mór Tuath, or great Tuath, which were associated together for certain legal and legislative purposes, and the troops of which were united to be in war under one commander.

W. K. Sullivan, Intro. to O'Curry's Anc. Irish, p. lxxix.

tub (tub), n. [ME. tubbe, < MD. D. tubbe = MLG. tubbe, tobbe, LG. tubbe, a tub; origin unknown. Some suppose, against phonetic probability, a connection with LG. tuber = OHG. zubar, MHG. zuber, zober, G. zuber, zober, a vessel, a contracted form of OHG. zwibar, zuipar, a vessel with two handles (cf. OHG. einbar, MHG. cinbar, imbar, G. cimer, a vessel with one handle); < LG. to, OHG. zwei, zwei, two, + -bar, connected with E. bear (see *amber*¹).] 1. An open wooden vessel made of staves, held together by hoops, surrounding a bottom: as, a tow-line-tub; a butter-tub; the tub in which the tow-line is coiled in a whale-boat.—2. The contents of a tub; as much as a tub will hold; as a measure of capacity, sometimes erroneously confounded with firkin. A tub of butter, by a statute of George III., was 84 pounds or 14 firkins, but locally still larger. As a measure of corn, by a statute of George II., the tub was 4 bushels. A tub of tea is 60 pounds. 3. Any wooden structure shaped like or resembling a tub. (a) A pulpit: used contemptuously. Compare tub-preacher, tub-thumper. [Slang, Eng.]

High on a gorgeous seat, that far out-shone Heny's gilt tub, or Flecknoe's Irish throne.
Pope, Dunciad, li. 2.

"The Rev. Moses Barraclough: 't'ub orator you call him sometimes, I think." "Ah!" said the Rector. . . . "He's a tailor by trade."
Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, viii.

(b) A clumsy, slow boat or vessel: so called in contempt.

There is no uglier vessel than a real old north-country Geordie or coalman, with the run of a sugar-box. . . . The name of this deep and wallowing tub was the Richard and Ann.
W. C. Russell, A Sea Queen, xvi.

(c) A boat used for practice-rowing.

The freshmen are put into harness in tub-pairs or four-gigs.
Dickens's Dict. Oxford, p. 17.

Practice in gigs, or more technically styled tubs (small boats to hold a pair of oarsmen, and in the stern of which the coach steers and advises the rowers).
Daily Telegraph, Feb. 9, 1887. (Encyc. Dict.)

4. A small cask for holding liquor, especially in the eighteenth century, and before the change in English revenue laws; such a cask in which brandy, gin, or the like was smuggled from the Continent.

I made three seizures, besides sweeping up those thirty-seven tubs.
Marryat, Three Cutters, ii.

5. A receptacle for water or other liquid for bathing the person. See bath-tub.

The retiring bower,
So furnish'd as might force the Persian's envy,
The silver bathing-tub, the cambric rubbers.
Massinger, Guardian, li. 5.

6. Hence, the act or process of bathing in a tub; specifically, a sponge-bath taken while standing in a tub. [Colloq.]

From early morn till dewy eve, when she had it out of him in the cold tub before putting him to bed.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, l. 2.

7. Sweating in a heated tub, formerly the common mode of treatment of lues venerea. Compare powdering-tub, 2.—8. In mining: (a) A bucket for raising ore from a mine. (b) A box, wagon, or tram for conveying coal from the working-face to the pit-bottom or gangway, or for underground haulage in general. The names given to the various vehicles or receptacles used for transporting coal, as well as their shape and size and the material of which they are made, vary considerably in different English collieries. See *buggy*³. (c) Same as keeve.

—9. The top of a malt-kiln. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]—10. The gurnet. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]—Cat under a tub (naut.), a supposed hindrance or obstacle; an accidental unavoidable delay. Thus, when a vessel is prevented from sailing by unavoidable circumstances, it is said that some one has a cat under a tub, it being a superstition that if a cat is put under a tub it will hinder the vessel from sailing. [New Eng.]—Culling-tub, a receptacle into which mackerel are thrown to be sorted.—Grog-tub (naut.), a tub for holding the grog which used to form part of the crew's rations.—Powdering-tub. See powdering-tub.—Quenching-tub. See quenching.—Tale of a tub, an idle or silly fiction; a cock-and-bull story.

Ye say they follow your law,
And vary not a shaw,
Which is a tale of a tub.

Bp. Bale, Comedy Concerning Three Laws. (Nares.)
You shall see in us that we preached no lies, nor tales of tubs, but even the true word of God. Coverdale.

To throw a tub to a whale, to create a diversion in order to avoid a danger.—Tub-camphor. See the quotation.

Japanese camphor is distinguished from Formosan by being coarser grained, clearer, of pinker hue, and by subliming at a lower temperature. It is also known as "Dutch" or "tub" camphor, the latter name arising from its being imported to Europe in tubs covered with matting, each placed within a second tub secured on the outside by hoops of twisted cane. Spons' Encyc. Manuf., p. 574.

tub (tub), v.; pret. and pp. tubbed, pp. tubbing. [< tub, n.] I. trans. 1. To plant or set in a tub: as, to tub plants.—2. To bathe in a tub or bath.

You shall be soaked, and stoned, and tubbed, and rubbed.
B. Jonson, Alchemist, iv. 1.

3. In mining, to line (a shaft) with a casing of wood or iron. See tubbing.

II. intrans. 1. To bathe or wash the person in a bathing-tub; especially, in colloquial use, to take the morning bath. [Eng.]

We all tub in England.

2. To row in a tub; practise in a tub. See tub, n.

tuba (tū'bā), n.; pl. tubæ, tubas (tū-bē, tū-bās). [L., a trumpet: see tube.] 1. A musical instrument of the trumpet family, of very large size and low pitch. It is essentially similar to the bombardon, though not always made in the same shape. Its compass is nearly four octaves, including, by means of three or five valves, all the chromatic tones. The fundamental tone is usually the third F or E₂ below middle C. Lower varieties are often called bass or contra-bass tubas. The tuba is much used in military bands, and is more or less common in the orchestra, where it is used in conjunction with the trombones.

2. In organ-building, a reed-stop of large scale, so connected with a separate bellows with extra weights that the tones are of exceptional power and majesty. Usually called tuba mirabilis.—3. In anat. and zool., a tube or tubular part or organ; specifically, the Eustachian tube, or salpinx. See hydra tuba (under hydra), and cut under scaphistoma.—Bass tuba, a musical instrument, the largest of the trumpet family, and the deepest and most sonorous member of the brass wind division of the orchestra, having a large and long metal tube and five valves: its compass is about four octaves from the fourth A below middle C. It was invented in 1835.—Dilatator tuba. See dilatator.

tubage (tū'bā), n. [< tub + -age.] 1. In gunn., the act or process of lining a heavy gun by inserting a tube of wrought-iron, bronze, or steel.

The present short steel tube has been the result of the essays in the tubage of guns.

Report of Chief of Ordnance, 1882, p. 244.

2. In med., the insertion of a tube into one of the passages, usually the esophagus or larynx; intubation.—Tubage of the glottis. Same as intubation of the larynx (which see, under intubation).

tubal (tū'bāl), n. [< tub + -al.] In med., of or relating to one of the passages called tubes in the body, more commonly the Fallopian tube.—Tubal dropsy, dropsy of one or both Fallopian tubes.—Tubal nephritis, Bright's disease of the kidneys.—Tubal pregnancy, the development of the embryo to some extent within the Fallopian tube instead of the uterus.

tubar (tū'bār), a. [*< tub + -ar*³.] Same as tubal: as, tubar pregnancy.

tubarium (tū-bā'ri-um), n.; pl. tubaria (-ā). [NL., < L. tubus, pipe, tube: see tube.] A tube or system of tubes secreted and inhabited by polypides or polypites; a tubular zoecium or zoöthecium.

tubate (tū'bāt), a. [< NL. tubatus*, < L. tubus, tube: see tube.] Forming a tube; tubiform; tubar; tubular; also, provided with a tube or tubes; tubulate.

tubbeck (tub'ek), n. [Burmese.] A sash of silk, or silk and cotton, usually red, worn by women in Burma.

tubber (tub'ér), n. [*< tub + -er*¹.] 1. A cooper. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]—2. In mining, a sort of pickaxe. Also called beele.

tubber-man (tub'ér-man), n. In mining, the man who uses a tubber. Also called beele-man.

tubbing (tub'ing), n. [Verbal n. of tub, v.] 1. The art of making tubs.—2. Material for tubs.

—3. In mining, a method of keeping out the water in sinking a shaft in very watery ground; also, the material employed for this. It consists in providing a water-tight lining for the shaft, which is inserted piece by piece as the sinking progresses, thus reducing the extent of surface from which the water enters the shaft as quickly and as completely as is possible. Tubbing was formerly usually made of oak timber in France, where this method of sinking was first introduced; but iron has been employed in England, in the form both of segments of cylinders and of complete rings. Tubbing of masonry has also been used in England and Germany. 4. The act or process of bathing or of being bathed in a tub; a tub-bath.

In spite of all the tubbing, rubbing, scrubbing,
The routing and the grubbing,
The Blacks, confound them! I were as black as ever!
Hood, A Black Job.

5. The act of racing in tubs. See tub-race.

A good deal of tubbing has been got through in the mornings.
The Field, March 5, 1887. (Encyc. Dict.)

tubbing-wedge (tub'ing-wej), n. A wedge of yellow pine, about 4 inches in length. Wedges of this kind are driven in between the joints of tubbing in order to make them water-tight.

tubbish (tub'ish), a. [*< tub + -ish*¹.] Like a tub; tubby; round and fat.

He was a short, round, large-faced, tubbish sort of man.
Dickens, Sketches, Characters, vii.

You look for men whose heads are rather tubbish,
Or drum-like, better formed for sound than sense.
Wolcot (Peter Pindar), Works, p. 136. (Davies.)

tubby (tub'i), a. [*< tub + -y*¹.] 1. Tub-shaped; round like a tub or barrel.

We had seen him coming up to Covent Garden in his green chaise-cart with the fat, tubby little horse.
Dickens, Sketches, Scenes, vi.

2. Having a sound like that of an empty tub when struck; sounding dull and without resonance; applied to stringed musical instruments.

tub-drubber (tub'drub'ér), n. A tub-thumper or tub-preacher. [Slang.]

Business and poetry agree as ill together as faith and reason: which two latter, as has been judiciously observed by the fam'd tub-drubber of Covent Garden, can never be brought to set their horses together.

Tom Brown, Works, III. 193. (Davies.)

tube (tüb), n. [< F. tube = Sp. Pg. It. tubo, < L. tubus, a pipe, tube; cf. tuba, a trumpet.] 1. A pipe or hollow cylinder, especially when of small size and used as a conduit for liquids, or for containing liquids, as in some forms of scientific apparatus. Mechanically there is no distinction between a pipe and a tube; but in use the two words are often somewhat arbitrarily distinguished. Thus, when the form of the thing is chiefly considered, tube is regularly used; as, a steam-boller having the shape of a large tube—not pipe; so, also, with reference to certain mechanical uses one word or the other is exclusively used: as, a gas-pipe, a drain-pipe, a test-tube. The words are also distinguished in use, but less clearly, according to the material employed: as, an iron pipe, a rubber tube, a brass tube, etc.

He lifts the tube [a gun], and levels with his eye;
Straight a short thunder breaks the frozen sky.
Pope, Windsor Forest, l. 129.

2. Specifically, the main body of a musical instrument of either the wood wind or the brass wind group. The bore of such instruments is usually conical, but sometimes cylindrical.—3. In anat. and zool., a hollow tubular organ: a pipe, canal, or duct conveying fluid or gas; especially, a pipe which seems to be empty—that is, conveys air: as, the bronchial tubes; the Eustachian tube. An artery or a vein is a tube, but nearly if not all the structures which convey special fluids receive distinctive names. See tuba, tubule.

4. In bot., any hollow elongated body or part of an organ: applied especially to a gamopetalous corolla or gamosepalous calyx, also to a united circle of stamens (see cut 9 under stamen).—5. A priming-tube.—6. A telescope, or that part of it into which the lenses are fitted.

A spot like which, perhaps,
Astronomer in the sun's lucent orb
Through his glazed optic tube yet never saw.
Milton, P. L., iii. 590.

Philosophic tube,
That brings the planets home into the eye
Of Observation.
Cowper, Task, iii. 229.

7. The barrel of a chain-pump.—8. A small receptacle of drawn lead, of approximately tubular form, closed at the bottom by bending it over twice or three times on itself, and having a screw-cap at the top, used to hold pigments or similar matter in a semifluid condition.—Auricular tube. See auricular.—Bellini's tubes, the excretory tubes of the kidneys, opening on the papilla.—Bowman's corneal tubes. See corneal.—Bronchial tubes. See bronchial.—Capillary, cardiac, cerebromedullary, conaral tube. See the adjectives.—Circulating tubes, tubes placed in steam-generators to afford or establish a circulation of the water.—Conversation-tube. See conversation.—Crookes tubes. See vacuum-tube.—Dental, deto-nating, diffusion tube. See the qualifying words.—Eso-phageal tube. Same as stomach-tube.—Eustachian, Fallopiian, gelatinous, hepatic tube. See the qualifying words.—Feeding-tube, an elastic tube passed into the stomach, through which food is introduced.—Geissler's tube, an apparatus in which light is produced by an electric discharge through rarefied gases. It is used with the induction-coil, and consists of a sealed tube with platinum connections at each end, through which the electric spark is transmitted. The color and intensity of the light depend upon the nature of the gas with which the tube is charged.—Impregnating-tube. See impregnate.—Intubation tube, a short hollow cylinder of peculiar shape, having a flange at its upper extremity, which is inserted between the vocal cords in cases of laryngeal obstruction, especially in croup.—Laryngeal tube, a short hollow cylinder of special form, used in intubation of the larynx.—Laticiferous tubes. See laticiferous.—Leiter's tube or coil, a long flexible tube made into a coil surrounding the body or a limb, through which hot or cold water is allowed to flow in order to raise or lower the temperature of the part.—Lightning tube. Same as fulgurite.—Lobular bronchial tube, Malpighian tubes, medullary tube. See lobular, Malpighian, medullary.—Milk-testing tubes, a form of lactometer containing a number of tubes graduated alike, in which different samples of milk can be put for comparison under identical conditions.—Muscular, nasal, pericentral tube. See the adjectives.—Pitot's tube, in hydrodynamics, an instrument for ascertaining the velocity of water in rivers, etc.; a current-meter. It consists in its simplest form of a bent glass tube A, which is held in the water in such a manner that its lower end is horizontal, and opposed to the direction of the flowing water. In consequence of the momentum of the moving fluid, the level rises within the tube to a height B, proportional to the velocity of the stream.—Pneumatic despatch tube. See pneumatic.—Pneumatic tube, a tube through which packets of merchandise, or messages, as telegraphic despatches or items of news inclosed in suitable boxes, are rapidly transmitted from one point to another by means of air-pressure. The difference of pressure necessary to effect the desired movement may be produced by forcing air in behind the carrier-box, after placing the latter in the tube, or by exhausting air from the space in front; or both these methods may be employed.—Postal tube, pyloric tube, receiving tubes of the kidney. See the qualifying words.—Rectal tube, an elastic rubber tube introduced into the rectum to give exit to the intestinal gases, or to facilitate the giving of enema.—Resistance-tube, in elect., a tube containing powdered carbon, water, or other conducting material used for introducing resistance into an electric circuit. The resistance is usually made adjustable either by changing the distance between the terminal plates in the case of a fluid, or Pitot's Tube.

A, tube; B, line to which water is raised by the force of the current.

by compressing the conducting material in the case of a powder.—Respiratory bronchial tube. Same as lobular bronchial tube.—Respiratory tube. See respiratory.—Salivary tubes of Pduger. See salivary.—Test tube. See test-tube.—Toricellian tubes. See Toricellian.—Tracheal tube, the trachea or windpipe. See trachea.—Tracheotomy-tube. See tracheotomy.—Tube of force, in elect. and magnetism, a space bounded by a number of lines of force. The total electric force is constant across any section of a tube of force.—Tube of safety. Same as safety-tube.—Tubes of Ferrein. Same as tubuli of Ferrein.—Uterine tubes, the Fallopiian tubes. See Fallopiian and uterus.—Visceral, vocal tube. See the adjectives. (See also air-tube, blowing-tube, breathing-tube, drainage-tube, stomach-tube, test-tube, vacuum-tube.)

a, one of the exhaust-pipes connecting exhaust-fan apparatus with series of transmitting boxes of central station, one of which is shown in section at A; b, valve; c, different style of valve; d, valve closed; e, window in top of box; f, perforated screen covering entrance to a; g, transmitting-tubes; h, single office-box consisting of two compartments, i, for sending, i', for receiving messages, separated by perforated partition; k, carrier-box of leather of diameter to fit tubes, and adapted to contain message; l, open tubes for receiving and sending the carrier-boxes; m, door to box, where messages are received through tubes n.

A recent improvement in the spinner tubes the yarn, rendering it smoother and more even than any process yet devised, leaving little to be desired in the manufacture of rope. Luce, Seamanship, p. 598.

tube-bearing (tüb'bär'ing), n. In entom., tubuliferous: specifically noting the Tubulifera.

tube-board (tüb'börd), n. See the quotation.

The channels, the resonators above the reeds, are not varied in size or shape [in the American reed-organ] as in the harmonium; they exactly correspond with the reeds, and are collectively known as the tube-board.
Encyc. Brit., XI. 483.

tube-breather (tüb'brē'fhēr), n. Any animal which breathes through tubes, tracheae, or spiracles; a tracheate, as an insect: distinguished from gill-breather.

tube-brush (tüb'brush), n. A cylindrical or spiral wire brush used to clean the flues of a steam-boiler.

tube-casts (tüb'kästs), n. pl. Minute cylinders found in the urine in certain forms of Bright's disease. They are formed in the tubules of the kidneys. See renal cast, under cast.

tube-clamp (tüb'klamp), n. 1. A clamp for engaging by compression and frictional contact the outer surface of a tube or pipe. Also tube-clip.—2. In well-boring, a tool for lifting well-tubing and drawing it up. It consists of two jaws which can be clamped securely on the tube, each jaw having a bail in which the tackle-hook edgewise. E. H. Knight.

tube-cleaner (tüb'klē'nēr), n. An instrument for scraping or brushing out the interiors of tubes, as a steel brush, a combination of steel springs arranged spirally about an axis, etc.

tube-clip (tüb'klip), n. 1. A form of tongs used by chemists, etc., for holding heated tubes or similar objects. E. H. Knight.—2. Same as tube-clamp, 1.

tube-cock (tüb'kok), n. A cock consisting of a nozzle within which is inserted an india-rubber tube with a screw-valve to compress it when the opening is to be closed.

tube-colors (tüb'kul'orz), n. pl. See color.

tube-compass (tüb'kum'pas), n. A draftsman's compass, having tubular legs containing sliding extension-pieces adjustable to any required length by means of set-screws.

tube-coral (tüb'kor'al), n. Tubipore.

tube-cutter (tüb'kut'er), n. A tool for cutting metallic tubes. The usual forms have a jaw to grasp the pipe, and an adjustable rotary cutter. E. H. Knight.

tube-door (tüb'dör), n. In a steam-engine, a door in the outer plate of a smoke-chamber, affording access to the tubes for examination and cleaning. E. H. Knight.

tube-drawing (tüb'dräng), n. The forming of tubes by drawing them down from thick cylinders.

tube-ferrule (tüb'fer'il), n. In a steam-boiler, a short slightly tapered metal sleeve driven over the end of a tube between the tube and the tube-sheet which supports the end, for the purpose of securing the parts firmly together by wedging. E. H. Knight.

tube-filter (tüb'fil'tēr), n. A chamber with porous or perforated walls, placed at the bottom of a driven well-tube or a pump suction-tube, to exclude gravel and other foreign matter.

tube-flower (tüb'flou'ēr), n. An ornamental shrub, Clerodendron Siphonanthus, native in the East Indies, widely cultivated in the tropics. It is an erect plant with few straight branches, and bears panicle white flowers with a very long curving corolla-tube (whence the name).

tube-flue (tüb'flō), n. In a furnace, a tube through which flame passes. E. H. Knight.

tube-foot (tüb'fut), n.; pl. tube-feet (-fēt). One of the numerous tubular locomotory pedicels of the ambulacra of echinoderms, as star-fishes and sea-urchins; a water-foot.

tube-form (tüb'fōrm), a. Same as tubiform.

tube-germination (tüb'jēr-mi-nā'shon), n. In bot., the germination of a spore which first produces a germ-tube.

tube-hearted (tüb'här'ted), a. Having a simple tubular heart: specifying the Leptocarpus.

tube-machine (tüb'mā-shēn'), n. A machine for making tubes or pipes; a tube-drawing machine.

tube-nosed (tüb'nōzd), a. Having tubular nostrils, as a petrel; tubinarial. See Tubinaris.

tube-plate (tüb'plāt), n. In steam-boilers, same as flue-plate.

tube-plug (tüb'plug), n. In locomotive engine, a plug for driving into the end of tubes which burst by the steam.

tube-pouch (tüb'pouch), n. A pouch for holding priming-tubes.

tuber (tüb'ēr), n. [L. tuber, a bump, swelling, tumor, knob on plants, truffle, etc.; perhaps <√ tur in tumere, swell. Hence ult. prob. truffle.]

1. In bot., a subterranean body, usually of an oblong or rounded form, consisting morphologically of a stolon-like branch of a rhizome much thickened, commonly at the end, and beset with "eyes," which are properly modified axillary buds. Some of these buds normally sprout the second season, giving rise to a new plant, for the nourishment of which the tuber is richly stored with starch. Typical examples are the common potato and the Jerusalem artichoke (see Helianthus, with cut); less familiar are the tubers of the dwarf dandelion (Krigia Dandelion), the American ground-nut (Apios tuberosa), and the ground-nut of Great Britain, Conopodium denudatum (Bismum feruosum). Moniform tubers occur, as in Equisetum fluviatile (a moniform) and Hydrocotyle Americana (a Hydrocotyle). Strictly the tuber is to be distinguished from the tubercle (see tubercle (d) (5) and the tuberous root and the tuberous these, especially the former.

The rhizome of Krigia Dandelion, showing the tubers, T, at the end of the long stolon S, and one larger tuber from which the plant has been developed; C, stem, underground; R, roots.

2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of subterranean dimycetous fungi, the truffles, having the peridium warty or tubercled, without definite base, the asci ovoid or globose, and one- to three- (or rarely) four-spored. About 50 species are known. T. aestivum is the common truffle. See truffle (with cut).—3. In pathol., anat., and zool., some rounded swelling part; a tuberosity, a tubercle; a knot or swelling which is not the result of disease: used chiefly as a Latin word (with Latin plural tubera).—Olfactory tuber. Same as caruncula mammillaris (which see, under caruncula).—Tuber annulare, the annular tuber of the brain the pons Varolii.—Tuber calcais, the tuberosity of the calcaneum; the backward projection of the bone of the heel.—Tuber cinereum, a conical projection from the lower part of the cerebrum, just behind the optic chiasma and in front of the corpora albicantia.—Tuber cochleae, the promontory of the tympanum. See promontory, 2 (b).—Tuber ischii. See ischium.—Tuber radii, the tuberosity of the radius, for the attachment of the biceps.

(see tuberous); but the term often embraces these, especially the former.

2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of subterranean dimycetous fungi, the truffles, having the peridium warty or tubercled, without definite base, the asci ovoid or globose, and one- to three- (or rarely) four-spored. About 50 species are known. T. aestivum is the common truffle. See truffle (with cut).—3. In pathol., anat., and zool., some rounded swelling part; a tuberosity, a tubercle; a knot or swelling which is not the result of disease: used chiefly as a Latin word (with Latin plural tubera).—Olfactory tuber. Same as caruncula mammillaris (which see, under caruncula).—Tuber annulare, the annular tuber of the brain the pons Varolii.—Tuber calcais, the tuberosity of the calcaneum; the backward projection of the bone of the heel.—Tuber cinereum, a conical projection from the lower part of the cerebrum, just behind the optic chiasma and in front of the corpora albicantia.—Tuber cochleae, the promontory of the tympanum. See promontory, 2 (b).—Tuber ischii. See ischium.—Tuber radii, the tuberosity of the radius, for the attachment of the biceps.

Tuberacea (tüb-ēr-ā-sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < I. tuber, a tuber, + -acea.] An order of hypogaeous or subepigaeous discomycetous fungi typified by the genus Tuber, having the gleba traversed by veins, and one- to eight-spored asci.

tuberated (tüb-ēr-ā-ted), a. [< I. L. tuberatus, covered with knots or bosses (< L. tuber, a knob, boss: see tuber), + -ed.] In herm., having a rounded projection, or more than one. A serpent tuberated is tied in a knot or a close coil near the middle of the body.

tubercle (tüb'ēr-kl), n. [< OF. tubercle, F. tubercule = Sp. tubérculo = Pg. It. tuberculo, < I. tuberculum, a small swelling, a pimple, tubercle, dim. of tuber, a swelling: see tuber.] A little tuber, or tubercule; a small tubercle; especially, a small projection of a bone, for the attachment of a ligament or tendon, as of the femur, hyoid, scaphoid, ulna, tibia, zygoma Serpent Tuberated.

3. See Tuberculum and tuberosity. (a) A small elevation of the surface; a wart or pimple; a hard pimple; a little swelling; as, tubercles about the base of a bill of a bird, or on a toad's back. (b) In Echinidae, one of the numerous small rounded elevations of the body, all to which the spines are articulated. See Echinidae, c. cuts under Echinus, Echinoides, and semia. (c) In bot.: (1) A hard, circumscribed, rounded elevation or nodule on the surface of the body or an organ. (2) A tubular mass of varying size, composed of granulation cells, which often undergo cæcation; the characteristic structure of tuberculous. (3) The affection called tuberculous. (d) In bot.: (1) Any wart-like or knob-like excrescence. (2) A very small tuber. (3) A root-growth resembling a tuberous root (see tuberosus), except that it bears ventitious buds, especially near the top, thus approaching a tuber, whose buds, however, are normal: the sweet potato is an example; also, a tumefied kind of root produced by species of Orchis and related genera, definite in number and shape, apparently developed from the base buds on the lower extremity of the stem, as in Orchis cædula and Ophrys apifera (see cuts under palmate and phrus). Compare tubercula. (e) In entom., same as supplementary eye (which see, under supplementary).—Acoustic, mygdaloid, carotid tubercle. See the adjectives. —Anatomical tubercle, in pathol., a wart-like growth often seen on the hands of those who constantly dissect or make post-mortem examinations. —Conoid tubercle, a bigness of the clavicle for the attachment of the conoid ligament. —Cuneate tubercle, the slight eminence of the cuneate funiculus on a level with the adjoining clavus. —Cuneiform tubercles. See cuneiform. —Darwin's tubercle, a nodule at the edge of the helix of the human ear, believed to be the vestige of the point of a pointed ear, such as is attributed to the fauns and satyrs of classic mythology, and as man may have had in an early stage of evolution of the human species. —Deltoid tubercle. (a) A roughness on the clavicle for the attachment of the deltoid ligament. (b) A roughness on the humerus for the insertion of the deltoid muscle: usually called deltoid ridge. —Genial tubercles. See genial. —Genital tubercle, the first appearance of the external organs of generation in the fetus. —Lacrimal tubercle, a small projection of the superior maxillary bone at the beginning of the lacrimal canal, a guide to the surgeon in operations upon the duct. —Laminated tubercle. Same as nodule. —Madreporic tubercles. See madreporic. —Mammillary tubercle. See mammillary. —Mental tubercle. Same as genial tubercles. —Miliary tubercle. Same as grutum. —Ocular tubercle. Same as eye-eminence. —Olfactory tubercle. Same as caruncula mammillaris which see, under caruncula. —Optic tubercles. See optic. —Pearly tubercle. Same as grutum. —Pharyngeal, plantar, scalene tubercle. See the adjectives. —Posterior tubercle of the thalamus. Same as pulvinar. —2. Supra-anal tubercle. See supra-anal. —Tubercle-bacilli, the bacillus characteristic of tuberculous. See cut under tuberculosis. —Tubercle of a rib, the shoulder of a rib, which articulates with the transverse process of the corresponding vertebra; a tuberculum. —Tubercle of Lower, a prominence, not constant, between the orifices of the superior and inferior vena cava in the right auricle. —Tubercle of Rolando. Same as tuberculum cinereum Rolandi (which see, under tuberculum). —Tubercle of the epiglottis. See cushion of the epiglottis. —Tubercle of the uina, the rough area at the base of the cornoid process, for the attachment of the brachialis anticus muscle.

tubercled (tū-bēr-kū-lēd), a. [< tubercle + -ed]. In bot., zool., and pathol., tuberculate; provided with or affected by tubercles.

tubercula, n. Plural of tuberculum.

tubercular (tū-bēr-kū-lār), a. [= F. tuberculaire = Sp. tubercular, *< NL. tubercularis, < L. tuberculum, tubercle; see tubercle]. 1. Formed like a tubercle; forming a tubercle; shaped into a little tuber or tuberosity; as, tubercular elevations. — 2. Having tubercles; tuberculate. — 3. In pathol., characterized by the presence of tubercles; of or pertaining to tuberculous; tuberculous.

Tubercular consumption, tuberculosis of the lungs. —Tubercular diathesis, a constitutional predisposition to tuberculous. —Tubercular laryngitis, tuberculosis of the larynx; laryngeal phthisis. —Tubercular leprosy, a form of leprosy characterized by the presence of macule and nodules of varying size on the surface of the body, especially the face; leontiasis; elephantiasis Græcorum.

Tubercular meningitis, an inflammation of the meninges of the brain, usually in children, due to the action of the tuberculous poison; acute hydrocephalus. —Tubercular peritonitis. See peritonitis. —Tubercular phthisis, tuberculosis, especially tuberculosis of the lungs. —Tubercular process, the elevation on the transverse process of a vertebra supporting the facet that articulates with the tubercle of the corresponding rib. —Tubercular sputum, the sputum of one suffering from pulmonary tuberculosis, usually containing large numbers of the tubercle-bacilli. It is a common means of spreading the contagion of tuberculosis.

Tubercularia (tū-bēr-kū-lā-rī-ā), n. [NL. Tuber, < L. tuberculum, tubercle; see tubercle]. A genus of hyphomycetous fungi, having the conidia in filiform, usually branched sporophores, which are ovoid or oblong, hyaline, and typically solitary. The species, of which more than 60 are known, are not well characterized. T. vulgaris, one of the commonest forms, occurs on trees or shrubs, as of the genera Corylus, Prunus, Rubus, etc.

Tuberculariæ (tū-bēr-kū-lā-rī-ē-ā), n. pl. [NL. Ehrenberg, 1818, < Tubercularia + -æ]. A family of hyphomycetous fungi, typified by the genus Tubercularia.

tubercularize (tū-bēr-kū-lā-rī-z), v. t.; pret. and pp. tubercularized, ppr. tubercularizing. [< tubercular + -ize]. To infect with tuberculosis.

Spittoons should always be emptied into the fire, and cleansed with boiling water. They should never be emptied on dung heaps, on garden soil (where they may tubercularize fowl) . . . Science, XIV. 177.

tubercularly (tū-bēr-kū-lār-lī), adv. With regard to a tubercle or tubercles; so as to exhibit tubercles. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXVI. 260.

tuberculate (tū-bēr-kū-lāt), a. [< NL. tuberculatus, < L. tuberculum, tubercle; see tubercle]. Same as tubercular.

tuberculated (tū-bēr-kū-lāt-ed), a. [< tuberculate + -ed]. Same as tuberculate.

tuberculation (tū-bēr-kū-lā-sh'n), n. [< tuberculate + -ion]. The formation of tubercles; the disposition or arrangement of a set of tubercles; a tubercular part, organ, or system.

tubercule (tū-bēr-kūl), n. [< F. tubercule, < L. tuberculum; see tubercle]. 1. A tubercle or tuberculum. — 2. In bot., any root of a class embracing both tuberous roots and tubercles; used specifically by Lindley. —Cineritious tubercule. (a) The tuber cinereum. (b) The tuberculum cinereum of Rolando.

tuberculi, n. Plural of tuberculum.

tuberculiform (tū-bēr-kū-lī-fōrm), a. [< L. tuberculum, tubercle, + forma, form]. Like a tubercle in form; tubercular.

tuberculin (tū-bēr-kū-līn), n. [< tuberculum + -in]. 1. A liquid prepared by Koch (first in 1890) from cultures of tubercle-bacillus, administered by hypodermic injection in tuberculosis as a therapeutic or diagnostic measure. Also called Koch's lymph, Koch's specific, and paratubercle. — 2. A ptomaine formed by the action of the tubercle-bacillus.

tuberculization (tū-bēr-kū-lī-zā-sh'n), n. [= F. tuberculisation; as tubercule + -ize + -ation]. In pathol., the formation of tubercles, or the condition of becoming tubercled.

tuberculize (tū-bēr-kū-līz), v. t.; pret. and pp. tuberculized, ppr. tuberculizing. [< tubercule + -ize]. Same as tubercularize. Medical News, LIII. 187.

tuberculoid (tū-bēr-kū-lōid), a. [< tubercule + -oid]. In zool., having the appearance or shape of a tubercle; tuberculiform.

tuberculose (tū-bēr-kū-lōs), a. [< NL. tuberculosus; see tuberculous]. Tuberculate.

tuberculosed (tū-bēr-kū-lōst), a. [< tuberculosus + -ed]. In pathol., affected with tuberculous. Medical News, LIII. 216.

tuberculositis (tū-bēr-kū-lō'sis), n. [NL., < L. tuberculum, tubercle, + -osis]. A specific disease affecting most of the tissues of the body, characterized by the formation of tubercles and the presence in the diseased parts of the tubercle-bacillus. —Acute miliary tuberculosis, an acute affection characterized by the deposit of large numbers of minute tubercles in various organs of the body, accompanied by high fever, rapid pulse, and marked prostration; galloping or quick consumption. The disease is almost always rapidly fatal. —Laryngeal tuberculosis, same as tubercular laryngitis (which see, under tubercular). —Pulmonary tuberculosis, tuberculosis of the lungs, popularly called consumption.

tuberculous (tū-bēr-kū-lūs), a. [= F. tuberculosus = Sp. Pg. tuberculoso = It. tuberculoso, *< ML. tuberculosus, < L. tuberculum, a tubercle; see tubercle]. 1. Tubercular; tuberculate. — 2. In pathol., affected by tubercles; exhibiting or containing tubercles. — 3. Pertaining to or of the nature of tuberculosis.

Greek elephantiasis . . . is a tuberculous disease affecting especially the skin, the mouth, and the nasal fossæ, and the organs of voice and respiration.

J. M. Carnochan, Operative Surgery, p. 39. Tuberculous arthritis, tuberculosis of a joint. —Tuberculous inflammation, inflammation caused by the presence of the tubercle-bacillus.

tuberculum (tū-bēr-kū-lūm), n.; pl. tubercula (-lā). [L.; see tubercle]. 1. A little tuber; a small tuberosity. — 2. In pathol.: (a) A hard, circumscribed, rounded elevation of small size on the surface of the body or an organ. (b) A nodule, of varying size, composed chiefly of granulation-cells: the characteristic lesion of tuberculosis. —Tubercula quadrigemina, the corpora quadrigemina. See corpus. —Tuberculum annulare, the pons Varolii. —Tuberculum cinereum Rolandi, an eminence between the cuneate funiculus and the posterolateral groove of the oblongata formed by the approach of the caput cornu posterioris to the surface. —Tuberculum dolorosum, a small painful nodule; neuma. —Tuberculum hypoglossi. Same as trigonum hypoglossi. —Tuberculum mallei. Same as short process of malleus (which see, under process). —Tuberculum of a rib, the protuberance or shoulder by which a rib abuts against a transverse process of a vertebra, as opposed to its head or capitulum. See cut under endoskeleton. —Tuberculum pubis, tuberculum pubicum. Same as pubic spine (which see, under pubic). —Tuberculum sellæ, the olivary eminence. See olivary.

tuberculus (tū-bēr-kū-lūs), n.; pl. tuberculi (-lī). [NL.; see tuberculum, tubercle]. In entom., same as supplementary eye (which see, under supplementary).

tube-retort (tū-bēr-rē-tōrt'), n. A chemical retort consisting of a glass tube having one end closed, and sometimes made with an enlarged bulb. E. H. Knight.

tuberiferous (tū-bēr-rīf-ē-rus), a. [< L. tuber, a tuber, + ferre = *E. bear*¹]. Producing or bearing tubers; as, a tuberiferous root. See cut under moniliform.

tuberiform (tū-bēr-i-fōrm), a. [< L. tuber, a tuber, + forma, form]. In bot., tuber-shaped.

tuberont (tū-bēr-ōn), n. [< OF. tiburon, < Sp. tiburon, a shark]. A shark.

There waited on our ship fishes as long as a man, which they call Tuberones.

T. Stevens, 1879 (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 138). (Davies.)

tuberos¹ (tū-bēr-ōs), a. [< L. tuberosus, tuberos; see tuberosus]. Tuberos; having knobs or tubers.

tuberos² (tū-bēr-rōs or tū-bēr-rōz; see the etymology), n. [= F. tubérose = Sp. Pg. tuberosa = It. tuberoso = G. tuberosa, < NL. tuberosa, the specific name of Polygonum tuberosa; prop. fem. of L. tuberosus, tuberos; see tuberos¹, tuberos. The name has become popularly confused with rose, and is, though prop. pronounced tū-bēr-ōs, commonly pronounced tū-bēr-ōz, as if *< tube + rose*¹. A garden and greenhouse bulb, Polygonum tuberosa, much cultivated for its creamy-white, exceedingly fragrant flowers. These have a funnel-shaped perianth with thick lobes, often doubled, and are racemed at the summit of a wand-like stem 2 or 3 feet high. An American variety called the pearl has a much lower stem with larger flowers, and is preferred for forcing. In northern latitudes the bulbs are imported—in Europe, from France and Italy, and in the northern United States, formerly from Europe, but they are now grown in Florida and Georgia, or even in New Jersey. Where the season is short, the bulb is sprouted under cover before setting out. The tuberos affords a perfumer's oil. —Wild tuberos. See Spiranthes.

tuberosity (tū-bēr-ōs'ī-tī), n.; pl. tuberosities (-tīz). [< F. tubérosité = Sp. tuberosidad = Pg. tuberosidade = It. tuberosità, *< ML. tuberositas (-s), < L. tuberosus, tuberos; see tuberosus].

1. The state of being tuberos. — 2. A swelling or prominence; especially, in anat. and zool., a large rough projection or protuberance of bone; a bony tuber, generally serving for the attachment of a muscle; as, the tuberosity of the ischium, or tuber ischii; the greater and lesser tuberosities of the humerus. Small tuberosities of bone are generally called tubercles. See cuts under crus, femur, humerus, and innominatum.

Whether he . . . swell out in starched ruffs, buckram stuffings, and monstrous tuberosities.

Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, I. 5. Gluteal tuberosity. Same as gluteal ridge (which see, under gluteal).

tuberos (tū-bēr-us), a. [< OF. tubereux, F. tubéreux = Sp. Pg. It. tuberoso, < L. tuberosus, full of lumps or protuberances, < tuber, a knob, lump; see tuber]. 1. Covered with knobby or wart-like prominences; knobbed. — 2. In bot., of the nature of or resembling a tuber; bearing tubers. —Tuberos anglioma, a subcutaneous form of angioma, resembling at times lipoma. —Tuberosus pea. Same as heath-pea. See also Lathyrus and frappetta. —Tuberos root, a true root, commonly one of a fascicle, so thickened by the storage of nutriment as to resemble a tuber. It bears no buds itself, but nourishes those produced on the persistent base of the stem. The root of the dahlia is an example. See cut under root.

tuberously (tū-bēr-us-lī), adv. With tubers or with tuberosity. Bull. of Ill. State Laboratory, II. 28.

tuberousness (tū-bēr-us-nēs), n. The state or character of being tuberous; tuberosity.

tuberous-rooted (tū-bēr-us-rōt'ed), a. An epithet properly of plants with tuberous roots, but more often applied to those bearing true tubers.

tube-scaler (tūb'skā-lēr), n. A tube-cleaner for cleansing the interior of steam-boiler flues from soot and incrustations. E. H. Knight.

tube-scraper (tūb'skrā-pēr), n. A tube-cleaner; especially, one with springs or blades, as distinguished from one made of wire.

tube-sheet (tūb'shēt), n. Same as flue-plate. —Tube-sheet cutter, a tool for cutting holes to receive the tubes in the tube-sheets of boilers. E. H. Knight.

tube-shell (tūb'shel), n. A bivalve mollusk of the family Gastrochænidæ in a broad sense, or Bacillus tuberculosus, very highly magnified.

Tubicolidae, as the watering-pot shell and related forms. They agree in secreting a shelly tube about the long siphons, and in extreme cases this formation makes them look very unlike ordinary bivalves. The case is like that of the related teredos or ship-worms. Both valves may be of considerable size and separate from the tube (see cut under Gastrochæna), or one may be free from the tube and the other fixed to it, as in Clavagella; or both may be very small and soldered to a large tube of singular construction, as in the true watering-pots. See cut under watering-pot.

tube-spinner (tūb'spin'ēr), n. A tube-weaver.
tube-stopper (tūb'stop'ēr), n. In steam-engin., a tube-plug.

tube-valve (tūb'valv), n. A valve consisting of a tube, which is held against its seat by a ball-weighted lever. E. H. Knight.

tube-vise (tūb'vis), n. A vise especially adapted for seizing tubes or pipes; a pipe-vise.

tube-weaver (tūb'wē'vēr), n. Any spider of the group Tubicolæ or Tubitelæ; a tube-spinner. Compare orb-weaver, tunnel-weaver, etc.

tube-well (tūb'wel), n. A device for obtaining water from beneath the ground, consisting of a wrought-iron pipe armed with a sharp point, and having a series of perforations at the lower end above the point. It is driven into the soft ground until water is reached. For many localities, where water is comparatively near the surface, a tube-well answers for all domestic purposes. In soils where the water is abundant near the surface, four or more tube-wells may be driven a few feet apart and united at the top by branch pipes, and may serve to supply a steam fire-engine, etc., by a direct connection, or to feed a steam-pump. It is commonly called, in the United States, a driven well, or drive-well.

tube-worm (tūb'werm), n. A tubicolous worm; one of the sedentary annelids which live in cases; especially, a serpula. See Tubicolæ, 2 (b).

tube-wrench (tūb'rench), n. A pipe-wrench.
tub-fake (tūb'fāk), n. A coil of tow-line in the line-tub of a whale-boat. J. W. Collins.

tubfast (tūb'fäst), n. A process of treatment for the cure of venereal disease by sweating in a heated tub for a considerable time, during which strict abstinence had to be observed.

Bring down rose-checked youth
To the tub-fast and the diet.

Shak., T. of A., iv. 3. 87.

tub-fish (tūb'fish), n. The sapphire gurnard, Trigla hirundo. See gurnard. [Local, Eng.]

tubful (tūb'fūl), n. [tub + -ful.] A quantity sufficient to fill a tub; as much as a tub will hold.

tub-gig (tūb'gig), n. A Welsh car. See the quotation.

The brothers (Carlyle) went in a steamer from Liverpool to Bangor, and thence to Llanberis, again in a tub-gig, or Welsh car.
Froude, Carlyle (Life in London, xi.).

tubi, n. Plural of tubus.

tubicen (tū'bi-sen), n. [L., a trumpeter, < tuba, trumpet, + canere, sing. play.] A trumpeter.

tubicinate (tū-bis'i-nat), v. i.; pret. and pp. tubicinated, ppr. tubicinating. [L. tubicen (-cin-), a trumpeter (see tubicen), + -ate.] To blow a trumpet. [Rare.]

Tubicolæ (tū-bik'ō-lē), n. pl. [NL., pl. of tubicola: see tubicole.] 1. A group of spiders which spin and inhabit a tubular web of silk, often strengthened outside with leaves or other materials; the tube-spinners. Compare Tubitelæ. — 2. A group of annelids. (a) In Cuvier's classification, the first order of Annelides, consisting of such genera as Serpula, Sabella, Terebellum, Amphitrite, and Dentalium: thus a heterogeneous association of certain mollusks and worms. (b) Now, the sedentary or tubicolous annelids, or those worms which live in tubes. They comprise a part of the polychætes annelids, and include several families, as Serpulidae, Sabellidae, Terebellidae, Amphitritidae, and others. They are also called Sedentaria, from their habits (as distinguished from Errantia), and Cephalobranchia or Capitibranchia, for the reason that the branchial organs are confined to the head or anterior part of the body. These are the processes which project so conspicuously from the tube. The tubes are of various substance and texture; they may be calcareous secretions of the animal, as in the Serpulæ, or composed of sandy and shelly or stony grit agglutinated together by a viscid secretion, as in the Terebellæ and others, or simply membranous. The tubes are straight or curved, sometimes spirally coiled, and usually form a complete case or covering into which the animal can withdraw for protection. Also Tubicolidae. See also cuts under Protula and Serpula.

tubicular (tū-bik'ō-lār), a. [tubicole + -ar.] Same as tubicolous.

Spirorhis and other tubicular annelids occur as early as the Silurian period. Pascoe, Zool. Class., p. 62.

tubicole (tū'bi-kōl), a. and n. [NL. tubicola, living in a tube (i. e. in a tubular web), < L. tubus, tube, + colere, dwell, inhabit.] 1. a. Inhabiting a tube or a tubular web, as a spider; tubicular or tubicolous, as an annelid.

II. n. A tubicolous annelid.

Tubicolidae (tū-bi-kol'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Tubicolæ + -idae.] 1. In conch., a family of bivalves: same as Gastrochænidæ. See tube-shell. — 2. Same as Tubicolæ, 2 (b).

tubicolous (tū-bik'ō-lus), a. [tubicole + -ous.] In zool., inhabiting a tube; tubicole; tubicular; spinning a tubular web, as a spider; secreting a tubular case, as an annelid or a rotifer; having a tubular or fistulous shell, as a mollusk. See Tubicolæ, tube-shell, and cuts under Protula and Serpula. — Tubicolous rotifers, those wheel-animalcules, as distinguished from the free forms, which are inclosed in gelatinous cases which they secrete. The elongated body ends behind in an adhesive disk, by which the animalcules, singly or several together, are fixed. The foot or peduncle, by which they are attached, is a process of the neural side of the body, and thus differs from the foot of most free rotifers, which is a median process from the opposite side of the body, usually segmented and ending in a pair of movable stylets.

tubicorn (tū'bi-kōrn), a. and n. [L. tubus, tube, + cornu, horn.] 1. a. Hollow-horned, as a ruminant; cavicorn.

II. n. A tubicorn or cavicorn ruminant.

Tubicornia (tū-bi-kōr'ni-ā), n. pl. [NL.: see tubicorn.] The hollow-horned ruminants: same as Cavicornia.

tubifacient (tū-bi-fā'shient), a. [L. tubus, tube, + facien (-is, ppr. of facere, make.)] Constructing a tube in which to dwell; tubicolous.

tubifer (tū'bi-fēr), n. [L. tubus, tube, + ferre = E. bear.] That which bears a tube, as a tubicolous annelid.

tubiflorous (tū'bi-flō-rus), a. [L. tubus, tube, + flos (-flor-), flower.] In bot., having tubular flowers or florets.

tubiform (tū'bi-fōrm), a. [= F. tubiforme, < L. tubus, tube, + forma, form.] Tubular; canalicular; having the form or character of a tube. Also tubiform.

tubilingual (tū-bi-ling'gwāl), a. [L. tubus, tube, + lingua, tongue: see lingual.] Having a tubular tongue, as various honey-suckers and other birds.

Tubilingues (tū-bi-ling'gwēz), n. pl. [NL.: see tubilingual.] In ornith., in Sundevall's system, a synonym of Cinnyrmorphæ: so named because the long extensible tongue constitutes a tubular suctorial organ.

Tubinares (tū-bi-nā'rēz), n. pl. [NL. (Illiger, 1811), < L. tubus, tube, + nares, nostrils.] The tube-nosed or tubinarian water-birds, having the nostrils formed into a tube which lies upon the base of the culmen, as in the petrels, or into a pair of tubes, one on each side of the base of the bill, as in the albatrosses; the petrel family, or Procellariidæ. Also called Nasutæ. See cuts under albatross, fulmar, hagden, and Estrelela.

tubinarian (tū-bi-nā'ri-al), a. [As Tubinares + -ian.] Having tubular nostrils, as a petrel; tube-nosed; of or pertaining to the Tubinares.

tubing (tū'bing), n. [Verbal n. of tube, v.] 1. The act of making tubes, or providing with tubes. — 2. A tube or tubes collectively: as, ten feet of tubing. — Rubber tubing, flexible tubing made of caoutchouc. Such tubing is made impervious to coal-gas by coating it with a solution of sodium silicate, or water-glass.

Tubingen school. See school.

tubiparous (tū-bip'a-rus), a. [L. tubus, tube, + parere, produce.] Giving rise to tubes or tubules: as, a tubiparous gland. Microsc. Sci., XXXI. 186.

Tubipora (tū-bip'ō-rā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1748), < L. tubus, tube, + porus, pore, passage.] The leading genus of Tubiporidae, or organ-pipe corals. T. musica is the best-known species. See cut in next column.

Tubiporaceæ (tū'bi-pō-rā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of tubiporaceus: see tubiporaceus.] An order of alcyonarian polyps, containing the Tubiporidae or organ-pipe corals.

tubiporacean (tū'bi-pō-rā'sē-an), a. and n. [tubiporaceus + -an.] Same as tubipore.

tubiporaceous (tū'bi-pō-rā'shi-us), a. [L. tubus, tube, + porus, pore, passage, + -aceus.] Having the character of organ-pipe coral; belonging to the Tubiporaceæ.

Organ-pipe Coral (Tubipora musica).

tubipore (tū'bi-pōr), a. and n. [L. tubus, tube, + porus, pore, passage.] 1. a. Having tubular corallites, each one of which opens by a pore tubiporaceous; belonging to the Tubiporidae.

II. n. An organ-pipe coral.

Tubiporidae (tū-bi-pōr'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Tubipora + -idae.] A family of alcyonarian polyps, typified by the genus Tubipora, which secrete a hard corallum in the form of tubules, these bound together by epithecæ and with out internal septa; the organ-pipe corals. The polyps have eight pinnately fringed tentacles, and therefore octocoralline, not hexacoralline as most corals. They are completely retractile within their tubes, and of a violet or grass-green color. The coral grows in large masses, usually red or purplish, and is found in the Indian and Pacific oceans. See cut under Tubipora.

tubiporite (tū'bi-pō-rīt), n. [Tubipora + -ite.] A fossil organ-pipe coral, or some similar organism.

Tubiporites (tū'bi-pō-rī'tēz), n. [NL. (Schlotheim): see tubiporite.] A genus of tubiporites.

tubiporous (tū'bi-pō-rus), a. [As tubipore + -ous.] Same as tubipore.

Tubitelæ (tū-bi-tē'lē), n. pl. [NL., < L. tubus, tube, + tela, a web.] A group of rectigra spiders, the tapestry-weavers, which have cylindrical spinnerets and spin tubular webs, the genera Agelena, Tegenaria, and others: opposed to Inequitelæ, Orbitelæ, etc.

tubitelar (tū-bi-tē'lār), a. [Tubitelæ + -ar.] Of or pertaining to the Tubitelæ.

Tubitelariæ (tū'bi-tē-lā'ri-ē), n. pl. [NL.: see Tubitelæ.] Same as Tubitelæ.

tubitelarian (tū'bi-tē-lā'ri-an), a. and n. [Tubitelariæ + -an.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the Tubitelariæ; tubitelar.

II. n. A spider of the division Tubitelariæ.

tubivalve (tū'bi-valv), n. and a. [L. tubus, tube, + valva, door: see valve.] 1. n. A valve mollusk with tubular siphonal sheath; a tube-shell.

II. a. Having a tubular or fistulous shell.
tubman (tūb'man), n.; pl. tubmen (-men). Barrister in the Court of Exchequer in England who had a precedence in motions. See postman.

tubo-abdominal (tū'bō-ab-dom'i-nāl), a. [L. tubus, tube, + abdomen (-min-), abdomen + -al.] Pertaining to a Fallopian tube and the cavity of the abdomen. — Tubo-abdominal pregnancy, a form of extra-uterine pregnancy in which the ovum is arrested near the amputated extremity of the Fallopian tube, projecting thence in the course of development into the abdominal cavity.

tub-oar (tūb'ōr), n. In whale-fishing, the oar which is pulled opposite the line-tub; also the tub-oarsman.

tub-oarsman (tūb'ōrz'man), n. In whale-fishing, a man whose place in a whale-boat is near the tub containing the whale-line, and whose business is to see that no entanglement of the line takes place.

tubo-ovarian (tū'bō-ō-vā'ri-an), a. [L. tubus, tube, + ovarium, ovary, + -an.] Pertaining to the ovary and to the Fallopian tube.

tubovarian (tū-bō-vā'ri-an), a. Same as tubo-ovarian.

tub-preacher (tūb'prē'chēr), n. [tub, a kind of pulpit, + preacher.] A contemptuous term for a dissenting minister; hence, a ranting ignorant preacher. Also tubster.

Here are your lawful ministers present, to whom if you do not resort, I hear, but to tub-preachers in convalescences.
Bp. Hacket, Abp. Williams, li. 165. (Davies)

tub-race (tūb'rās), n. A race in which the contestants paddle with the hands in tubs.

tu-brugget, n. [ME., < tu, a form of tow, + brugge, bridge: see tow + bridge.] A draw-bridge. Halliwel.

Non stont the heved above the tu-brugge
Faste bi Waleis.

Execution of Sir Simon Fraser (Child's Ballads, VI. 282).

b-saw (tub'sà), n. A cylindrical saw which cuts staves from a block, and rounds them transversely: same as annular saw (a) (which see, under saw). E. H. Knight.

b-size (tub'siz), v. t. See the quotation.

If paper is to be tub-sized as well as engine-sized, an animal size, made by soaking out the gelatine from clippings of horns, hides, etc., is mixed with dissolved alum and placed in a tub or vat, through which the web of paper is run after leaving the first set of driers.

Harper's Mag., LXXV. 124.

bstert (tub'stér), n. [tub + *-ster*¹.] Same as tub-preacher.

He (says the tubster) that would be rich according to the practice of this wicked age must play the thief or the cheat.

th-sugar (tub'shug'är), n. Sugar packed in hests, and covered over with fine clay.

th-thumper (tub'thum'pér), n. A violent or rasticulating preacher; one who employs violent action to give the effect or appearance of earnestness to his sermons. [Slang.]

th-thumping (tub'thum'ping), a. Ranting. [Slang.]

Very modest gifts, belonging to what may be called the th-thumping school of oratory, have been known to fill a large church with eager congregations.

Contemporary Rev., LIV. 253.

tubular (tū'bū-lār), a. [= F. tubulaire = Sp. Pg. tubular = It. tubulare, tubolare, < NL. tubularis*, < L. tubulus, a small pipe; see tubule.] 1. Having the form of a tube or pipe, without reference to size; tubuliform; tubiform; tubar; fistulous.—2. In bot., tube-like; tube-shaped; having a tube; tubulous: as, a tubular corolla or calyx.

Tubular filiform very fine colourless rootlets.

Le Maout and Decaisne, Botany (trans.), p. 917.

3. As applied to respiratory sounds, noting a sound like that produced by a current of air through a tube.—Horizontal tubular steam-boiler. See steam-boiler.—Rotary tubular steam-boiler. See rotary.—Tubular arch bridge. See bridge.—Tubular bridge. See bridge.—Tubular car, a car of which the sills and floor-framing are made of iron gas-pipe.—Tubular crane, a crane with a hollow or tubular jib. Large tubular cranes sometimes have jibs made of boiler-plate rolled into tubular form and joined with rivets.—Tubular floating dock, a dock formed of capacious tubes, which may be sunk or floated, according as the tubular spaces are filled with water or with air.—Tubular girder, any hollow girder of metal, whatever the form in section. See girder.—Tubular glands, compound glands in which the divisions of the secreting cavity assume a tubular form.—Tubular lantern, a lantern having no guards except a rectangular frame of tubes through which the air-supply is carried. Car-Builders' Dict.—Tubular respiration. See respiration.—Tubular retort. Same as tub-retort.—Tubular steam-boiler. See steam-boiler.—Tubular surface. In geom. See surface.

Tubularia (tū'bū-lā-rī-ä), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1755), neut. pl. of tubularis*, tubular: see tubular.] An old genus of tubularian hydroids, now restricted as the type of a family Tubulariidae. T. indurata is an example.

Tubulariæ (tū'bū-lā-rī-ä), n. pl. [NL.: see Tubularia.] The tubularian hydroids, or gymnoblastic hydromedusans; the Alcatea or Gymnoblastea.

tubularian (tū'bū-lā-rī-an), a. and n. [< Tubularia + -an.] 1. a. Hydriform in tubular shape with a wide disk, a manubrium, and solid tentacles; of or pertaining to the Tubulariæ, or gymnoblastic hydrozoans.—Tubularian hydroids, the Gymnoblastea.

II. n. A member of the Tubulariæ. The tubularian polyps form an extensive series, by some authors divided into many families. Some of them resemble slender-stemmed composite flowers, as a dandelion, for example. In the usual forms the hydranth is flower-like and of which may unite below into a root-like part (hydrorhiza). The hydranth bears the gonophores upon stalks (blastostyles), these may be permanently attached (spores), or may become detached and float off as free medusoids. Both hydranths and gonophores are naked (gymnoblastic or athecate).

tubularian (tū'bū-lā-rī-an), a. and n. Same as tubularian.

Tubulariidae (tū'bū-lā-rī-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Tubularia + -idae.] A restricted family of tubularian hydromedusans, represented by the genus Tubularia, having the polyp-stock invested with a hard perisarc. Also Tubulariæ. See out under Tubularia.

tubularity (tū'bū-lār'i-ti), n. [< tubular + -ity.] The quality of a tubular sound. See tubular, 3.

tubularly (tū'bū-lār-li), adv. In the form of a tube.

Cells, either expanded or tubularly or vesicularly constricted.

H. C. Wood, Fresh-Water Algae, p. 182.

tubulate (tū'bū-lāt), a. [= F. tubulé = Pg. tubulado, < L. tubulatus, formed like a pipe, < tubulus, a small pipe, a tube; see tubule.] Formed like a tube; tubulated.

tubulate (tū'bū-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. tubulated, ppr. tubulating. [< tubulate, a.] To form into a tube; also, to furnish with a tube. Elect. Rev. (Amer.), XV. xxv. 2.

A tubulated glass shade with a metal base.

Atkinson, tr. of Ganot's Physics, § 763.

Tubulated retort, a retort having a small tube, furnished with a stopper, so placed above the bulb that substances can be introduced into the retort without soiling the neck. A receiver with a similar tube and stopper is called a tubulated receiver.

tubulation (tū'bū-lā'shon), n. [< tubulate + -ion.] The formation of a tube or tubule; the disposition or arrangement of a set of tubes.

tubulature (tū'bū-lā-tür), n. [< tubulate + -ure.] The mouth or short neck at the upper part of a tubulated retort.

tubule (tū'bū), n. [= F. tubule = It. tubolo, < L. tubulus, a small pipe, a water-pipe, < tubus, a pipe, tube; see tube.] A small tube or pipe: as, the urineriferous or seminiferous tubules. See tubulus, and cut under Malpighian.

tubuli, n. Plural of tubulus.

tubulibranch (tū'bū-lī-brangk), a. and n. [< L. tubulus, a tube, + branchiæ, gills.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Tubulibranchiata; tubulibranchian; tubulibranchiate.

II. n. A member of the Tubulibranchiata.

tubulibranchian (tū'bū-lī-brang'ki-an), a. and n. [As Tubulibranchiata + -an.] Same as tubulibranch.

Tubulibranchiata (tū'bū-lī-brang'ki-ä'tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of tubulibranchiatus: see tubulibranchiate.] In Cuvier's classification, the seventh order of gastropods, having a more or less irregularly tubular shell, and consisting of 3 genera—Vermetus, Magilus, and Siliquaria: an artificial group. See cuts under the generic names.

tubulibranchiate (tū'bū-lī-brang'ki-ät), a. and n. [< NL. tubulibranchiatus, < L. tubulus, tube, + branchiæ, gills.] Same as tubulibranch.

tubulicolæ (tū'bū-līk'ō-lē), n. pl. [NL., pl. of tubulicola*: see tubulicole.] In Cuvier's classification, an order of polyps, including the tubularians.

tubulicole (tū'bū-lī-kōl), a. and n. [*< NL. tubulicola, inhabiting a tube, < L. tubulus, a tube, + colere, dwell, inhabit. Cf. tubicole.] I. a. Inhabiting a tubule, as a polyp; belonging to the Tubulicolæ.

II. n. A polyp of the group Tubulicolæ.

Tubulidentata (tū'bū-lī-den-tä'tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of tubulidentatus*: see tubulidentate.] One of the groups of the Entomophaga, or insectivorous Edentata, represented by the aardvark, or Cape ant-eater of South Africa, Orycteropus capensis. They furnish the only instance known among mammals of truly compound teeth, these organs being composed of bundles of parallel upright denticles, so that their substance is traversed by a number of parallel vertical canals. See also cut under aardvark.

tubulidentate (tū'bū-lī-den-tät), a. [*< NL. tubulidentatus, < L. tubulus, a tube, + dentatus, toothed: see dentate.] Having compound teeth composed of tubular bundles of denticles; of or pertaining to the Tubulidentata.

Tubulifera (tū'bū-līf'erä), n. pl. [NL. (Latreille, 1807), neut. pl. of tubulifer*: see tubu- liferous.] 1. In Latreille's system, the second tribe of hymenopterous insects, including the families Proctotrupiæ and Chrysididæ, by MacLeay and Westwood restricted to the family Chrysididæ: opposed to Securifera.—2. A stirps of the order Thysanoptera, including the genus Phlaothrips. Haldy, 1836.

tubuliferous (tū'bū-līf'er-us), a. [*< NL. tubulifer, < L. tubulus, tube, + ferre = *E. bear*¹.] In entom., having a tube-like ovipositor (see tubulus, 2); of or pertaining to the family Chrysididæ or suborder Tubulifera.

Tubulifloræ (tū'bū-lī-flō'rē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1836), fem. pl. of tubuliflorus*: see tubuliflorous.] A suborder of composite plants, including 11 tribes, or all of the order except the Mutisiaceæ and Cichoriaceæ. It is characterized by flower-heads with all the perfect flowers tubular. Many genera possess ray-flowers, which are either pistillate or neutral. The types of tribes included are the genera Vernonia, Eupatorium, Aster, Inula, Heli-anthus, Helianthus, Anthemis, Senecio, Calendula, Arctotis, and Cynara. The composite genera having all the flowers ligulate were formerly classed in the suborder Ligulifloræ.

tubuliflorous (tū'bū-lī-flō'rus), a. [*< NL. tubuliflorus, < L. tubulus, tube, + flos (flor), flower.] In bot., having the flowers of a head (in Compositæ) all with tubular corollas; of or pertaining to the Tubulifloræ.

tubuliform (tū'bū-lī-fōrm), a. [< L. tubulus, tube, + forma, form.] Having the form of a small tube or tubule; tubular. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 381.

Tubulipora (tū'bū-līp'ō-rä), n. [NL. (Lamarck), < L. tubulus, a tube, + porus, pore.] The typical genus of Tubuliporida, containing such species as T. serpens.

tubulipore (tū'bū-lī-pōr), n. [< NL. Tubulipora.] A polyzoan of the family Tubuliporida.

Tubuliporida (tū'bū-lī-pōr'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Johnston, 1838), < Tubulipora + -idae.] A family of polyzoans, typified by the genus Tubulipora, and characterized by the tubular calcareous calyces.

tubuliporoid (tū'bū-lī-pō'roid), a. [< tubulipore + -oid.] Resembling, characteristic of, or pertaining to the Tubuliporida.

Tubulose (tū'bū-lō'sē), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of tubulosus*, tubulose: see tubulose, tubulous.] A group of Paleozoic corals of doubtful character, named by Edwards and Haime for such forms as Aulopora and Pyrgia. They have compound or simple corallum (in the former case the corallites united by branches and creeping conenchyme), tubular or pyramidal, rudimentary septa, and no tabulae.

tubulose (tū'bū-lōs), a. [*< NL. tubulosus: see tubulous.] Tubular or tubuliform; fistulous. Specifically—(a) Of or pertaining to the Tubulose. (b) In entom., noting the lingua or tongue when it is very long, tubular, and capable of inflation, but without any terminal orifice, so that liquids cannot be sucked through it, as in the bees. (c) In bot., tubular.

tubulure (tū'bū-lür), n. [< F. tubulure; as tubule + -ure.] In chem., a short open tube at the top of a retort, or in a receiver or bell-jar.

tubulus (tū'bū-lūs), n.; pl. tubuli (-lī). [NL., < L. tubulus, tube; see tubule.] 1. In anat. and zool., a tubule: chiefly in the plural: as, tubuli lactiferi, the milk-ducts; tubuli uriniferi, the urinary tubules.—2. In entom., a prolongation of the abdomen, consisting of several rings which can be retracted one into another like a pocket-telescope, serving as an ovipositor. It is found in the females of many flies and of the hymenopterous family Chrysididæ. See Tubulifera, 1.—3. In bot., in Hymenomyces, a tube on the surface of the pileus which is lined with the hymenium; in Pyrenomyces, same as neck (see pore, 2, 3); in Diatomaceæ, same as cornu, 2 (b).—Tubuli lactiferi. See def. 1, and galactophorous ducts, under duct.—Tubuli of Ferrein, the tubules composing the pyramid of Ferrein. Also called tubuli of Ferrein.—Tubuli recti, short straight sections of the seminiferous tubules situated between the convoluted secreting tubules and the rete testis.

Tuburcinia (tū-bēr-sin'i-ä), n. [NL., < L. tuburcinari, eat greedily, devour.] A genus of molds. T. scabies is known by the name of potato-scab.

tubus (tū'būs), n.; pl. tubi (-bī). [NL., < L. tubus, a pipe, tube; see tube.] 1. In anat. and zool., a tube. [Little used.]—2. In entom., the mentum, or basal part of the labium, of a bee, forming with the bases of the maxillæ a tube leading to the epipharynx.—Tubus Astronomicus, a constellation: same as Telescopium.—Tubus vertebralis, tubus medullaris, the spinal canal: the hollow of the spinal column, containing the spinal cord.

Tubularian Polyp (Tubularia indurata).
1, group of polypites, half natural size; 2, single hydranth, enlarged; a, mouth, surrounded by tentacles; b, ovaries.

Tubulidentata.
Part of Tooth of Aardvark (Orycteropus capensis), in cross-section, highly magnified.

tub-wheel (tub'hwēl), n. 1. A form of water-wheel which has a vertical axis and radial spiral floats placed between two cases attached to the axis. The water is precipitated between the cases from a chute, and is discharged at the bottom of the wheel. E. H. Knight.—2. In tanning, a hollow revolving drum in which skins or leather are washed by being tumbled in water. Similar wheels are used in other industries.

Tub-wheel, r.

tucan (tō'kan), n. [Mex. tucan (Hernandez).] The Mexican pocket-gopher, Geomys mexicanus. It is one of the largest gophers, 10 or 11 inches long, or, with the tail, from 13 to 14 inches, and resembles the quachil, but has soft, sleek fur. The incisors are each bisected by a single median furrow, which distinguishes the animal from all United States gophers except G. castaneus. The coloration is a pure chestnut-brown, the hind feet and tail are mostly whitish, and sometimes there are small white patches on the under parts. The under fur is plumbeous, and some specimens vary from the normal chestnut to a plumbago or anthracite color. Also tucan, tuca, tuza.

Tucana (tū-kā'nā), n. [NL., < toucan, q. v.] 1. A southern constellation, the Toucan, south of the Phoenix, made by Petrus Theodori in the fifteenth century.—2. In ornith., same as Ramphastos. Brisson, 1760.

tucet (tū'set), n. [L. tucetum, tuccetum, a thick gravy: see *tucket*².] A steak. See *tucket*².

*tuff*² (tuf), a. An old spelling of tough.

*tuff*³ (tuf), n. [< F. tuf, formerly also tuffa, soft stone, < It. tufa, soft stone, tufa, tufa, < L. tophus, tofus, a soft sandy stone. Cf. toph, tufa.] A volcanic fragmental rock, varying from coarse deposits made of materials resembling fine gravel in size to those which are like the finest sand. Corsi defines tufa as being similar in composition to peperino, but bearing the marks of having been transported by and deposited from water. The tophus of Vitruvius and Columella was of volcanic origin; that of Virgil and Pliny was calcareous. The tufa of the Italians, at the present time, is volcanic, and is the same rock which was designated by the Romans as lapis ruber; it closely resembles peperino (the lapis Albanus of the Romans), and does not differ, except in color and degree of compactness, from the modern apertone (Lapis Gabinus), or from the so-called manzanita (apertone). These are all fragmental rocks made up of more or less firmly compacted volcanic cinders and ashes, and are all included under the term tuft as used by English geologists.

tuft-cone (tuft'kōn), n. A conical elevation made up of ashes or other fragmentary eruptive material accumulated around a volcanic orifice.

ulasi (tö'lä-si), n. [Telugu]. Same as toolsi.

ula-work (tö'lä-wérk), n. Niello; niello-work; a kind of decorative work somewhat similar to enameling, done chiefly on silver.

Niello-work has been long known, and is described by Pliny, by whom its invention is attributed to the Egyptians.

It differs from enamel in that this latter is a vitreous compound, while niello is a combination of sulphur with silver, copper, and lead, the relative proportion of ingredients, as given by different authors, varying greatly.

The composition of niello, according to Pliny, is three parts of silver with one of copper, and no lead.

All the more modern recipes demand less silver and some less the quantity of the precious metal diminishing from century to century.

Benvenuto Cellini gives one sixth silver, one third copper, and one half lead as the composition of niello.

The above has reference to the metallic ingredients of this article; in its manufacture sulphur is generally added in excess, that which is not taken up by the metals being volatilized in the process, which is performed in a crucible, a little sal ammoniac being used as flux.

Niello-work has been done in Russia for many years, and especially at Tula, which is the best-known locality for this branch of decorative art, although it is also done in that country.

Niello is called in Russia "black silver." See niello.

tulchan, tulchin (tul'chan, -chin), n. [Origin obscure.] A calf's skin stuffed with straw, and set beside a cow, to make her give her milk: used formerly in Scotland.—Tulchan bishops, a name derisively applied to the persons appointed as titular bishops to the Scottish sees immediately after the Reformation, in whose names the revenues of the sees were drawn by the lay barons who had appropriated them. Carlyle, Cromwell's Letters and Speeches, Int., iv. [Scotch.]

tule (tö'le), n. [Amer. Sp.] A bulrush or club-rush of either of two species which are common in California and adjacent regions occupy large areas of overflowed bottom-land and marsh. One of these is the common bulrush, Scirpus lacustris, which there, in the variety occidentalis, becomes sometimes 8 or 10 feet high and an inch or more thick at the base. The other species is the very similar S. tatora, found eastward to Louisiana, and also in South America. See Scirpus (with cut).

tule-wren (tö'le-ren), n. A kind of marsh-wren, Cistothorus or Telmatochates palustris, var. paludicola, which abounds in the tule-marshes of California.

tulip (tū'lip), n. [Formerly also tuilpe, tulpie, also tuilpa; = MD. tuilpe, D. tulp = G. tuilpe = Ir. tulp, < OF. tulipe, tulippe, F. tuilpe = OSp. tuilpa = Pg. tuilpa = It. tuilpa (NL. tuilpa); also MD. tuilpaan = Dan. tuilpaan = Sw. tuilpan, < OF. tulipan = Sp. tuilpan = It. tuilpano, a tulip; so called from its likeness to a turban: a particular use of OF. "tulipan, tulipant, tulipant, etc., > E. tulipant, etc., NL. tulipa, etc., a turban: see turban." 1. A plant of the genus Tulipa, of which several species are well-known garden bulbs with highly colored bell-shaped flowers, blooming in spring. The common garden tulips are derived chiefly from T. Gemeriana, a native of central and southern Europe and adjacent parts of Asia, having shining scarlet flowers with purple-black spots at the base of the divisions, or a partly yellow claw. Varieties of this species have been developed with great care, especially in the Netherlands, the seat at one time of a "tulipomania." The catalogue of a Haarlem florist of recent date offered 1,800 varieties. They are divided into four classes: namely, "breeders" or "self-flowers," with the natural plain color; "bizarres," having a clear yellow ground with red, brown, maroon, or purple markings; "byblossoms," with a white background and maroon, or purple markings; and "roses," with white background variegated with shades of rose-color, deep-red, or scarlet. It is said that when a self-tulip once "breaks," the new variety remains always the same. Another long-cultivated tulip is the Duc Van Thol, T. suavelens, with fragrant scarlet, yellow, or variegated flowers, early, and especially suited for pot-culture and forcing. T. præcox, having scarlet flowers with large black-purple spots surrounded with yellow near the base, also affords varieties. Less conspicuous or less known species are T. Oculus-sois, the sun-eye tulip, with a brilliant scarlet perianth, having black spots at the base of the segments; T. australis (T. Celsiana), with bright-yellow flowers smaller than the common kinds; T. Clusiana, low and delicate, having the three inner divisions pure white, the three outer stained with pink; T. pulchella, type of a group of very pretty dwarf species; and T. Greigi, the Turkistan tulip, one of the most showy and desirable of all known tulips, bearing goblet-shaped flowers, commonly of a vivid orange-scarlet hue, also purple or yellow, from 4 to 6 inches broad when fully expanded.

2. In ordnance, a bell-shaped outward swell of the muzzle of a gun, as a rule abandoned in modern ordnance.

The armament of the Collingwood consists of four 45-ton steel breech-loading guns, 27 ft. 4 in. long, and gradually tapering from a diameter of 4 ft. 7 in. at the breech to 17 in. near the muzzle, which possesses what artillerymen call a tulip or swell.

African tulip, a plant of the genus Hæmanthus.—Butterfly-tulip, the mariposa-lily or pretty-grass, Calochortis, of California.—Cape tulip, (see Hæmanthus). (b) A liliaceous plant, Bewmetra columbiaensis (Tulipa Breyneana), of the Cape of Good Hope.—Checkered tulip, drooping tulip. See wild tulip (a), below.—Duc Van Thol tulip. See def. 1.—Parrot-tulip, varieties of T. acuminata (T. Tricocca), of a dwarf habit, with the petals curved and fantastically fringed, variegated, partly green, the form and color suggesting the name; also, a variety of the common tulip: the former sometimes distinguished as Florentine parrot-tulip.—Sun's-eye tulip. See def. 1.—Turkistan tulip. See def. 1.—Van Thol tulip. Short for Duc Van Thol tulip. See above.—Wild tulip. (a) In England, Tulipa sylvestris, the only native species; also, provincially, the guinea-hen plant, Fritillaria Meleagris, similarly called checkered and drooping tulip. (b) In California, same as butterfly-tulip: see above.

Tulipa (tū'li-pā), n. [NL. [Malpighi, 1675; earlier by Lobel, 1576]: see tulip.] 1. A genus of liliaceous plants, the tulips, type of the tribe Tulipeæ. It is characterized by flowers which are usually erect, bell-shaped, and marked by spots near the base, but without nectar-bearing glands; and by oblong, linear, erect, basifixed anthers. There are about 50 species, natives of Europe and Asia, extending from England to Japan, and southward into northern Africa. They are bulbous plants, with a simple stem bearing few leaves, linear or broader, and a handsome solitary flower, rarely two or three. See tulip.

2†. [L. c.] A tulip.

tulipant, n. An obsolete form of turban.

Tulipeæ (tū'li-pē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1845), < Tulipa + -æ.] A tribe of liliaceous plants, characterized by solitary or loosely racemed flowers, and a leaf-bearing stem produced from a coated or scaly bulb. It includes over 200 species belonging to 7 genera, of which Tulipa is the type. They are natives of north temperate regions, usually producing large and handsome flowers. The tribe includes the lily, crown-imperial, tulip, dog-tooth violet or adder's-tongue, and mariposa-lily. The genera Lilium, Erythronium, and Lloydia are partly American, and Calochortis wholly so; for the others, see Fritillaria, Gagea, and Tulipa.

tulip-ear (tū'lip-ēr), n. An upright or prick-eared in dogs. Shaw.

tulip-eared (tū'lip-ēr-d), a. Prick-eared, as a dog.

tulipiet, n. An obsolete form of tulip.

tulipist (tū'lip-ist), n. [< tulip + -ist.] A cultivator of tulips. Sir T. Browne, Urn-burial, Ep. Ded.

tulipomania (tū'li-pō-mā'ni-ä), n. [= F. tulipomanie (Ménage); as E. tulip + Gr. pavia, madness; see mania. The D. term is tulpenhandel, tulip-trade.] A craze for the cultivation or acquisition of tulips; specifically, that which arose in the Netherlands about the year 1634, seized on all classes like an epidemic, and led to disasters such as result from great financial catastrophes. Tulip-marts were established in various towns, where roots were sold and resold as stocks on the exchange. A single root of Semper Augustus was sold for 13,000 florins. After several years the government found it necessary to interfere.

tulipomaniac (tū'li-pō-mā'ni-ak), n. [< tulipomania + -ac.] One who is affected with tulipomania. H. Spencer, Education, p. 66.

tulip-poplar (tū'lip-pop'lār), n. Same as tulip-tree.

tulip-root (tū'lip-röt), n. A disease of oats, caused by a nematoid worm of the family Anguillulidæ, Tylenchus devastatrix, which causes the base of the stem to swell until it somewhat resembles a tulip-bulb.

tulip-shell (tū'lip-shel), n. A shell of the family Fasciolaridæ; specifically, Fasciolaria tulipa. See cut under Fasciolaria.

tulip-tree (tū'lip-trē), n. A tree, Liriodendron Tulipifera, found in North America, where, among deciduous trees, it is surpassed in size only by the sycamore (Platanus occidentalis) and the bald cypress (Taxodium distichum). A tree believed to be identical with it is found in China. The wood is soft, fine, and straight-grained, and is easily worked; it is used in construction and for inside finish, cabinet-work, pumps, woodenware, etc. The bark, especially of the root, is acrid and bitter, and is used domestically as a stimulant tonic. The tulip-tree is quite hardy, and is a much-admired shade and ornamental tree. Its timber, or the tree itself, is known as whitewood, though the wood turns yellowish on exposure, and as poplar, tulip-poplar, or yellow poplar. An old name, saddle-tree or saddle-leaf, refers to the form of the leaf; another, canoe-wood, to the use in which it was found among the Indians. The present name (the best of the common names) has reference to the flowers, which in form and size resemble a large tulip, the petals greenish-yellow marked with orange. See Liriodendron (with cut).

The large tulip tree, which we call a poplar.

Beverly, Hist. Virginia, iv. § 13.

2. [cap.] One of the religious sect known as Dunkers. See Dunker, 1.—3. A breed of domestic pigeons which perform certain aerial evolution called tumbling, during which they fall through the air for a distance before making play with their wings. This performance is an exaggeration of the sweeping or gyrating flight characteristic of wild pigeons, and an approach to it may be shown by any pigeons, whether, for example, a hawk dashes into a flock. Tumblers have short round head with high forehead and very short beak.

are classed in two series, those bred to flight and those bred to color. The former are the ordinary or flying tumblers, most noted for their performances in mid air; the latter are even trained to tumble in a room. Some tumblers, known as Oriental rollers, are noted for leaving the tumblers individually and rising to execute the movement. Tumblers bred to color without special reference to their flight are of many strains, known by color-names, black, red, blue mottle, red or yellow agate, almond-splash, etc. A kind of greyhound formerly used in coursing rabbits; so called in allusion to his characteristic motions and springs.

I have seen a nimble tumbler on a burrow'd Greene Bend cleave awry his course, yet give a checke And throw himself upon a rabbit's necke. W. Browne, Britannia's Pastorals, ii. 4.

A porpoise. [Scotch.] Delphinus Phocena, . . . Scot. Pellock. Tumbler. Merona.

Dr. Walker, Essays on Nat. Hist., p. 532. (Jamieson.) The aquatic larva of a mosquito, gnat, or member of the Culicidae; a wriggler: so called from the manner in which they roll over & over in the water. [Local, U. S.]—7. A ure or toy representing a fat person, usually mandarin, sitting with crossed legs. The base of the figure is rounded, so as to rock at touch.

Her legs tucked up mysteriously under her gown into round ball, so that her figure resembled in shape the tumbler sold by the Italians.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, II. 570. One of a band of London reckless profiteers in the early part of the eighteenth century.

A third sort [of Mohocks] are the tumblers, whose office is to set women on their heads.

Steele, Spectator, No. 324. A drinking-glass. (a) One with a rounded or indented bottom, so that it may not be set down without being emptied and inverted. (b) One without stem or foot, simply cylindrical or conical in form.

She . . . reminds him of days which he must remember, when she had a wine-glass out of poor Pa's tumbler.

Thackeray, Philip, xxviii. O. A sort of spring-latch in a lock which detains the bolt so as to prevent its motion until a key lifts it and sets the bolt at liberty.—1. Same as tumbling-box.—12. In a gunlock, a piece of the nature of a lever, attached to the pivot of the hammer of the lock, and swiveled to the tip of the main-spring, which, when the hammer is released by pulling the trigger, forces the hammer violently forward, causing it to strike and explode the charge. See also cut under pin-lock.—13. A form of printing-machine which rocks or tumbles to the impression-surface. [Eng.]—14. Naut., one of the movable pins for the engagement of the cat-head stopper and shank-painter. These pins, moving simultaneously, release the ends of the cat-stopper and shank-painter, thus letting go the anchor.

15. In weaving, any one of a set of levers (also called combers) from which in some forms of loom the heddles are suspended.—16. Same as tumbrel, 1.

Behind them (the gipsies) followed the train of laden asses, and small carts, or tumblers, as they were called in that country [south of Scotland]. Scott, Guy Mannering, viii.

tumbler-brush (tum'blér-brush), n. A brush made for the special purpose of cleaning the inside of a tumbler or drinking-glass.

tumbler-cart (tum'blér-kärt), n. Same as tumbrel, 1.

More recently tumbler carts with solid wheels, mere slabs of timber, were substituted. Quarterly Rev., CXLVI. 38.

tumbler-dog (tum'blér-dog), n. A catch to hold the hasp of a padlock locked except when it enters the tumbler. Car-Builder's Dict.

tumbler-drum (tum'blér-drum), n. Same as tumbling-barrel.

The skins are either trodden in it with the feet, or put into a tumbler-drum. Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 373.

tumblerful (tum'blér-fúl), n. [tumbler + ful.] The quantity of liquid which fills or nearly fills a tumbler: as, to drink a tumblerful of water.

tumbler-glass (tum'blér-glàs), n. Same as tumbler, 9.

tumbler-holder (tum'blér-höl'dér), n. A circular frame of metal with a handle, into which a glass of soda-water, etc., is set, for convenience in drinking.

tumbler-lock (tum'blér-lok), n. A lock having a set of disks or latches which must be arranged in some particular way with reference to one another before the bolt can be shot. It is a form of permutation-lock. See cut under lock.

tumbler-punch (tum'blér-punch), n. In gunsmithing, a small punch with two blades, used, in taking a gun apart, to remove the arbor of the tumbler, etc.

tumbler-stand (tum'blér-stand), n. A tray for tumblers, used with a soda-water fountain, etc. Some are fitted with appliances for washing the tumblers. Compare tumbler-washer.

tumbler-tank (tum'blér-tangk), n. In plumbing, a flush-tank in which an oblong tilting receiving vessel pivoted midwise, and having a midwise partition, is fitted and poised in such manner that when water runs into one of the compartments of the vessel a quantity must accumulate before it can tilt and discharge its contents, and in such manner that the tilt brings the opposite compartment into position to be filled. A considerable volume of water is thus suddenly discharged at each tilting of the receiving vessel, although the stream affording the supply may be small.

tumbler-washer (tum'blér-wosh'ér), n. A tumbler-stand so contrived as to wash automatically the tumblers placed upon it. A usual form consists of a basin fitted with upright projecting pipes, on which the tumblers are hung bottom up, and from which jets of water escape into the tumblers, used with soda-water fountains, etc.

tumbleweed (tum'bl-wēd), n. A branching plant whose top assumes a globular figure and in autumn is detached and rolled over the plains by the wind, scattering its seed. The name is given to several such plants in the western United States. Species so called are Amarantus albus (compare ghost-plant) and A. bioides, Portulaca lanceolata (Dakota and Montana), the bug-seed, Corsipermum hyssopifolium, and the winged pigweed, Cycloloma platyphylla. Also called rolling-weed.

The list of plants having the habit of rounding up their stems and branches so as to form a nearly spherical plant body, which at the end of the season breaks away at the root, thus forming a tumbleweed, must be increased by adding the winged pigweed. Amer. Nat., XXI. 229.

tumbling (tum'bling), n. [Verbal n. of tumble, v.] The act of falling; also, the act of turning somersaults, and the like; specifically, the action of the tumbler pigeon in flight.

tumbling (tum'bling), a. [ME. towmblyng; ppr. of tumble.] Falling; fleeting; passing; transitory.

Withouth thanne trusten in the towmblynges fortunes of men? Chaucer, Boethius, ii. meter 3.

tumbling-barrel (tum'bling-bar'el), n. See barrel.

tumbling-bay (tum'bling-bā), n. In hydraulic engin., that part of a weir in which the surface of the outflowing water assumes a downwardly directed curvilinear form.

tumbling-bob (tum'bling-bob), n. In mach., a weighted arm or lever which, when moved to a certain point, reacts and by its weight produces movements in other parts of the machine.

tumbling-box (tum'bling-boks), n. A box or cylindrical vessel of wood or iron, pivoted at each end or at two corners, so that it can be made to revolve. Small castings, shot, pens, needles, buttons, and similar objects are placed in the box, with a quantity of loose emery-powder, sand, sawdust, or other abrasant, and when the box revolves the abrasant and the objects fall or tumble over, rubbing against each other and becoming quickly cleaned or polished. The device is largely used in many manufactories to save labor in cleaning and polishing material of all kinds, and in mixing or scouring mill, tumble, tumbler-drum, tumbling-wheel, turning-barrel, scouring-barrel.

tumbling-net (tum'bling-net), n. A trammel-net.

tumbling-shaft (tum'bling-shāft), n. The cam-shaft used in stamping-mills, threshing-machines, etc. E. H. Knight.

tumbling-trough (tum'bling-trôf), n. In the manufacture of sulphuric acid in the so-called cascade apparatus, a trough or box of pipe-clay constructed on the principle of the tumbler-tank for conveying nitric acid into the leaden chambers.

tumbling-wheel (tum'bling-hwēl), n. In mach., a variety of the tumbling-box, used especially for polishing wooden bobbins, shoe-pegs, etc.

tumbly (tum'bli), a. [tumble + -y.] Uneven, rough, humpy, or lumpy, as if full of debris which has tumbled upon it; covered with loose rocks, as a sea-bottom or fishing-ground.

tumbrel (tum'brel), n. [Also tumbril, and formerly tumbrell, tumrell; < ME. tonberel, toncerel, tunrel, < OF. tumbrell, tumberel, tonberel, tumbreau, tumbereau, tonbereau, F. tonbereau, a dump-cart, < tonber, fall, tumble: see tumb, tumble.] 1. A low cart used by farmers for the removal of dung, etc.; a dung-cart. The body of the cart was a separate box, sometimes called a which (see which), in which the dung or other load was placed, to be dumped by upsetting the box. The name is often given to the carts used to convey the victims of the French Revolution to the guillotine, but contemporary plates represent these as large four-wheeled wagons.

What stinking scavenger (if so he will, Though streets be fair) but may right easily fill His dungy tumbrel? Marston, Satires, iv. 13.

Along the Paris streets the death-carts rumble hollow and harsh. Six tumbrils carry the day's wine to La Guillotine. Dickens, Tale of Two Cities, III. 13.

A yoke of starveling steers, in a tumbril cart, the wheels of which were formed from a solid block of wood. S. Judd, Margaret, i. 4.

2. A covered cart with two wheels, which accompanies artillery, for the conveyance of tools, ammunition, etc.—3. A chair fixed on a pair of wheels and having very long shafts, used to punish scolds. On its being wheeled into a pond backward, and suddenly tilted up, the woman was plunged into the water. Compare cucking-stool and ducking-stool.

In this town (Shepton-Mallet, Whitstone, Somersetshire) was anciently a tumbrell or cucking-stool, set up . . . in the time of Henry III. for the correction of unquiet women. J. Collinson, Hist. Somersetshire (ed. 1791), III. 460.

4. A sort of circular cage or crib, made of osiers or twigs, used in some parts of England for holding food for sheep in winter.

tumefacient (tū-mē-fā'shēnt), a. Swelling; swollen.

The infant . . . had grown unctuous and tumefacient under the kisses and embraces of half the hotel. Bret Harte, By Shore and Sedge, p. 73.

tumefaction (tū-mē-fak'shon), n. [< F. tuméfaction = Sp. tumefacción, < L. tumefacere, pp. tumefactus, swell: see tumefy.] 1. The act or process of swelling or rising into a tumor; also, the condition of being tumefied or swollen.—2. That which is tumefied or swollen; a tumid part; a tumor.

The common signs and effects of weak fibres are paleness, a weak pulse, tumefactions in the whole body or parts. Arbuthnot, Aliments, vi.

tumefy (tū'mē-fi), v.; pret. and pp. tumefied, ppr. tumefying. [*< F. tuméfier, cause to swell, < LL. tumeficare, < L. tumefacere, cause to swell, < tumere, swell, & facere, make: see tumid and -fy.] I, trans. To swell, or cause to swell or be tumid.

To swell, tumefy, stiffen, not the diction only, but the tenor of the thought. De Quincy.

II. intrans. To swell; become tumid.

tumescence (tū-mes'ens), n. [< tumescen(t) + -ce.] 1. The state of growing tumid; tumefaction.—2. A swelling, tumid part, or tumor; an intumescence.

tumescen (tū-mes'ent), a. [< L. tumescen(t)-s, ppr. of tumescere, begin to swell or swell up, inceptive of tumere, swell: see tumid.] 1. Swelling; tumefying; forming into a tumor; intumescen.—2. In bot., slightly tumid or swollen.

tumid (tū'mid), a. [= Sp. tímido = Pg. It. tumido, < L. tumidus, swollen, swelling, < tumere, swell; cf. tumulus, a mound (see tumulus), Gr. τῆμος, a mound (see tomb), Skt. tumra, swelling, standing out, √ tum, swell, increase.] 1. Swollen; slightly inflated; tumefied: as, a tumid leg; tumid flesh.—2. Protuberant; rising above the level.

So high as heaved the tumid hills, so low Down sunk a hollow bottom broad and deep, Capacious bed of waters. Milton, P. L., vii. 288.

3. Swelling in sound or sense; pompous; bombastic; inflated: as, a tumid expression; a tumid style.

A mind no way tumid, light, effeminate, confused, or melancholic. Bacon, Political Fables, v. Expi.

The real poet, who is not driven by failing language or thought into frigid or tumid absurdities. R. W. Church, Spenser, ii.

Tumid wing, in entom., a wing in which the membrane of every cell is larger than the cell itself, so that it projects slightly, as in the saw-flies.

tumidly (tū-mid'i-ti), n. [< LL. tumidita(t)-s, a swelling, a tumor, < L. tumidus, swollen: see tumid.] 1. The state or character of being tumid or swollen.

The swelling diction of Æschylus and Isaiah resembles that of Almanzor and Maximin no more than the tumidly of a muscle resembles the tumidly of a boll. The former is symptomatic of health and strength, the latter of debility and disease. Macaulay, Dryden.

Tumbler.

Hence—2. A pompous or bombastic style; turquidness; fustian.

tumidly (tū'mid-lī), adv. In a tumid manner or form.

tumidness (tū'mid-nes), n. The state of being tumid, in any sense.—Syn. Bathos, Fustian, etc. See bombast.

tumika-oil (tū'mi-kā-oil), n. A concrete fixed oil from the seeds of the wild mangosteen, Diospyros Embryopteris.

tummer (tum'ēr), n. A connecting cylinder in a carding-machine.

The carding engines [in cotton-manufacture] are often made with two main cylinders and a connecting cylinder called the tummer. Encyc. Brit., VI. 494.

tummlle (tum'l), v. A dialectal form of tumble.

tumogo, n. [African.] An African antelope, the water-buck, Kobus ellipsiprymnus.

tumor, tumour (tū'mor), n. [< F. tumeur = Sp. Pg. tumor = It. tumore, < L. tumor, a swelling, the state of being swollen, < tumere, swell: see tumid.] 1. A swell or rise of any kind. [Rare.]

One tumour drown'd another, billows strove
To outswell ambition, water air outdrove.
B. Jonson, Prince Henry's Barriers.

2. In med.: (a) A swelling; one of the four necessary accompaniments, according to the older pathologists, of inflammation—namely, calor, dolor, rubor, et tumor (heat, pain, redness, and swelling). (b) An abnormal prominence existing upon any of the cutaneous, mucous, or serous surfaces in any part of the body, and not due to acute inflammation. A tumor is usually a new formation of tissue foreign to the part in which it exists, and is thus distinguished in general from hypertrophy, though a hypertrophy may occasionally be so localized as to constitute a true tumor. A neoplasm is called a tumor when it forms a prominence on any surface. A swelling may be acute or chronic, and may be circumscribed or diffuse; a tumor is a chronic circumscribed swelling.

3. A swelling port or style; tumidity; bombast. She satisfies and fills the mind, without tumour and ostentation. Evelyn, True Religion, II. 174.

Adipose tumor, a lipoma.—Aneurismal tumor, an aneurism.—Apostoli's method for the treatment of fibroid tumor of the uterus, destruction of the tumor by electrolysis.—Benign tumor, a tumor which does not recur, as a rule, after removal, and is not inimical to the life of the patient.—Cavernous tumor, a tumor formed of loosely reticulated tissue.—Dermatoid or dermoid tumor, a cystic tumor the inner wall of which is composed of cutaneous tissue, and which often contains one of the appendages of the skin, such as hair, nails, or even teeth.—Encysted tumor. See encyst.—Erectile tumor, a tumor composed of a vascular tissue resembling erectile tissue.—Fibroid tumor, a tumor composed of fibrous tissue: usually referring to a fibromuscular tumor of the uterus.—Fibroplastic tumor. See spindle-celled sarcoma, under sarcoma.—Floating tumor, a movable body within the abdomen, usually the spleen or a kidney, which has loose attachments, allowing of change of position of the organ.—Gubler's tumor, a prominence on the back of the wrist, seen in cases of wrist-drop from lead-poisoning.—Histoid tumor, a tumor composed of connective tissue.—Malignant tumor, a tumor which tends to recur after removal, and eventually to cause the patient's death.—Margaroid tumor, cholesteatoma.—Mixed tumor, a tumor composed of more than one kind of tissue.—Ovarian tumor. See ovarian.—Phantom tumor, a circumscribed abdominal swelling, occurring usually in hysterical women, due to muscular contraction or to an accumulation of intestinal gases. The swelling commonly disappears when the patient is asleep or under the influence of an anesthetic. It is sometimes very deceptive in its appearance, and has not infrequently been mistaken for pregnancy.—Sand tumor, psammoma: so called because of the sand-like calcareous matter which it contains.—Teratoid tumor. Same as teratoma.—Thomas's operation for the removal of uterine fibroid tumors. See operation.—Transition tumor. See transition.—Tumor albus, tuberculous synovitis, especially of the knee-joint; white-swelling.—Vascular tumor. See vascular.—Warty tumor. See warty.

tumored, tumoured (tū'mord), a. [< tumor + -ed.] Affected with a tumor or tumors; swollen; tumid; distended. [Rare.]

I might behold his legs tumor'd and swell'd.
Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 362.

tumorous (tū'mor-us), a. [= Pg. It. tumoroso, < LL. tumorosus, swollen, inflated, bloated, < L. tumor, a swelling: see tumor.] 1. Swelling; protuberant.

Who ever saw any cypress or pine small below and above and tumorous in the middle, unless some diseased plant? Sir H. Wotton.

2. Vainly pompous; bombastic, as language or style; fustian.

According to their subject these styles vary; . . . for that which is high and lofty, declaring excellent matter, becomes vast and tumorous, speaking of petty and inferior things. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

tumour, tumoured. See tumor, tumored.
tump (tump), n. [< W. tump, a round mass, a hillock; cf. L. tumulus, a mound: see tumulus, tomb.] A little hillock; a heap; a clump.

He stopped his little nag short of the crest, and got off and looked ahead of him from behind a tump of whortles. R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, xxxi.

tump (tump), v. t. [< tump, n.] In hort., to form a mass of earth or a hillock round (a plant): as, to tump teazel.

tump-line (tump'lin), n. [Perhaps a corruption, among the Canadian Indians and the French voyageurs, of *E. temple-line (or of a corresponding F. term), < *temple*² (F. tempe + *line*²).] A strap by which a pack is carried across a portage or through the woods. It crosses the forehead, the advantage being that its use in this position leaves the hands free for clearing the way with an ax or otherwise; it is frequently shifted in position so as to cross the breast, for temporary relief. This method of carrying is common through the St. Lawrence valley and to the furthest Northwest, alike among whites, half-breeds, and Indians. The term is used in Maine and on its borders: elsewhere the strap is called portage-strap or pack-strap.

tumpy (tump'pi), a. [< tump + -y.] Abounding in tumps or hillocks; uneven. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

tum-tum (tum'tum), n. [Appar. ult. imitative of the beating of a drum; cf. *tum*² and tom-tom.] 1. A favorite dish in the West Indies, made by beating boiled plantains quite soft in a wooden mortar. It is eaten like a potato-pudding, or made into round cakes and fried.—2. Same as tom-tom.

tumular (tū'mū-lār), a. [< F. tumulaire, as if < *L. tumularis, < tumulus, a mound: see tumulus.] Same as tumulary. Pinkerton.

tumulary (tū'mū-lā-ri), a. [As tumular, q. v.] Consisting in a heap; formed or being in a heap or hillock.

tumulate¹ (tū'mū-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. tumulated, ppr. tumulating. [< L. tumulatus, pp. of tumulare, cover with a mound, entomb, < tumulus, a mound: see tumulus.] To cover with a mound; bury.

tumulate² (tū'mū-lāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. tumulated, ppr. tumulating. [Irreg. (after tumulus, a mound) < L. tumere, swell: see tumid.] To swell.

His heart begins to rise, and his passions to tumulate and ferment into a storm. Bp. Wilkins, Nat. Religion, i. 17.

tumuli, n. Plural of tumulus.

tumulose, tumulous (tū'mū-lōs, -lus), a. [< L. tumulosus, full of mounds or hills, < tumulus, a mound: see tumulus.] Full of mounds or hills. Bailey, 1727. [Rare.]

tumulosity (tū'mū-lōs'i-ti), n. [< tumulose + -ity.] The state of being tumulous. Bailey, 1727. [Rare.]

tumulous, a. See tumulose.

tumult (tū'mult), n. [< F. tumulte = Pr. tumult = Sp. Pg. It. tumulto, < L. tumultus, commotion, disturbance, tumult, < tumere, swell, be excited: see tumid.] 1. The commotion, disturbance, or agitation of a multitude, usually accompanied with great noise, uproar, and confused talking; an uproar; hence, a noisy uprising, as of a mob.

What meaneth the noise of this tumult? 1 Sam. iv. 14.

There is this difference between the tumults here [in Cairo] and those at Constantinople, that the latter are commonly begun by some resolute fellows among the janizaries, whereas here the mob is generally raised by some great man, who envies one that is a rival to him. Pococke, Description of the East, I. 169.

2. Violent commotion or agitation, with confusion of sounds.

In this piece of poetry, what can be nobler than the idea it gives us of the Supreme Being thus raising a tumult among the elements, and recovering them out of their confusion, thus troubling and becalming nature? Addison, Spectator, No. 489.

The tumult in her mind seemed not yet abated.

Goldsmith, Vicar, xix.

tumulti (tū'mult), v. i. [< tumult, n. Cf. tumultuate.] To make a tumult; to be in great commotion. Milton, Hist. Eng., vi.

tumultuously (tū'mul-tū-ā-ri-li), adv. 1. In a tumultuary or disorderly manner.

Divers thousands of the Jews tumultuously resisted. Sandys, Christ's Passion (1640), notes, p. 95.

2. Without system or order.

I have, according to your desire, putt in writing these Minutes of Lives tumultuously, as they occur'd to my thoughts, or as occasionally I had information of them. Aubrey, Lives, Int. Ep.

tumultuariness (tū-mul'tū-ā-ri-nes), n. Disorderly or tumultuous conduct; turbulence disposition to tumult. Eikon Basilike.

tumultuary (tū-mul'tū-ā-ri), a. [< F. tumultuaire = Sp. Pg. It. tumultuario, < L. tumultuarius, full of tumult, hurried, < tumultus, tumult: see tumult.] 1. Disorderly; riotous; promiscuous; confused: as, a tumultuary conflict.

It would be too long to relate the tumultuary insurrections of the inhabitants of Constantinople, Antioch, and Alexandria. Milton, Ans. to Salmasius, i.

2. Restless; agitated; uneasy.

Men who live without religion live always in a tumultuary and restless state. Bp. Atterbury.

tumultuate (tū-mul'tū-āt), v. i. [< L. tumultuatus, pp. of tumultuari (> It. tumultuare = Pg. tumultuar), make a tumult, < tumulus, tumult: see tumult.] To make a tumult. Milton, Ans. to Salmasius, x.

tumultuation (tū-mul'tū-ā'shon), n. [< tumultuate + -ion.] Commotion; irregular or disorderly movement. Boyle. [Rare.]

Furiously running in upon him, with tumultuous speech he violently raught from his head his rich cap of sables. Knolly.

=Syn. 2. Uproarious, riotous.

tumultuously (tū-mul'tū-us-li), adv. In a tumultuous manner; with tumult or turbulence by a disorderly multitude.

tumultuousness (tū-mul'tū-us-nes), n. The state of being tumultuous, in any sense; disorder; commotion.

tumultus (tū-mul'tus), n. [L., commotion: see tumult.] Commotion; irregular action.—Tumultus cordis, irregular action of the heart.—Tumultus sermonis, a form of aphasia in which the patient stutters when reading aloud.

tumulus (tū'mū-lus), n.; pl. tumuli (-li). [L. tumulus, a mound, < tumere, swell: see tumid. Cf. *tump*¹ and tomb.] A sepulchral mound, as the famous Mound of Marathon raised over the bodies of those Athenians who fell in repelling the invading Persians; a barrow; very frequently, a mound covering and inclosing more or less elaborate structure of masonry. The raising of mounds over the tombs of the dead, particularly of distinguished persons, or those slain in battle, was a usual practice among very many peoples from the most remote antiquity.

tun (tun), n. [Also ton (now used only in the sense of a measure); early mod. E. tunne, tonne, < ME. tunne, tonne, < AS. tunne = ML. tonne, D. ton = OHG. tunna, MHG. tunne, < tonne = Ice. tunna = Sw. tunna, OSw. tynn = Dan. tønne; cf. F. tonne (dim. tonneau, O. tonnel = Pr. Pg. dim. tonel), ML. tunna, I. and Gael. tunna; root unknown; it is uncertain whether the Teut. or the Celtic forms are original. Hence tunnel.] 1. A large cask for holding liquids, especially wine, ale, or beer. See *ton*¹.

As who so filled a tonne of a freshe ryuer,
And went forth with that water to woke with [add water] Themese. Piers Plowman (B), xv. 3.

Take four and twenty bucks and ewes,
And ten tun of the wine.

Childe Wyet (Child's Ballads), II. 7.

The tallow to be saponified is placed in a large, slightly conical, wooden tun, which is made of oak or cedar, and is tightly bound with iron hoops.

W. L. Carpenter, Soap and Candles, p. 2.

2. Any vessel; a jar.

Wel offer of the welle than of the tonne

She drank. Chaucer, Clerk's Tale, l. 1.

3. In a brewery, the fermenting-vat or -tan. E. H. Knight.—4. A measure of capacity, equal by old statutes to 252 wine-gallons. There was local tun of beer in London of 2 butts, and a custom tun of sweet oil was 236 gallons, and of syrup 34 barrels. As all measures of capacity are regarded by metrologists as having been defined first by weight, some have supposed the tun was originally a short ton weight of water. 5. In conch., a shell of the genus Dolium family Dolidæ; a tun-shell.—6. The upper of a chimney; also, the chimney itself. [Prov. Eng.] has with the tij. tunny of chemeneyis.

Bury Wills (ed. Tymms), p. 20.

tun, in her. See bolli.

tun, v. t.; pret. and pp. tunned, ppr. tunning, tun¹, n. 1. To store in a tun or tuns, wine or malt liquor; hence, to store in vessels of any sort for keeping.

Amongst the rest with the apples of Adam; the juice of them they tun up and send into Turkey.

Sandys, Travels, p. 175.

To fill as if a tun.

A vale of tears, a vessel tunn'd with breath,
By sickness broach'd, to be drawn out by death.

Quarles, Emblems, lib. 8.

To mingle with liquor when it is stored, as the purpose of flavoring it, or making it up better.

The women of our northern parts do tun the herb alone into their ale.

Gerard's Herball (1579), quoted by Bickerdyke, p. 63.

tun², n. An obsolete form of town.

ta¹ (tō'nā), n. A fish. See Tynnus, Sarda, reynus, and tunny.

ta² (tū'nā), n. A species of prickly-pear, Opuntia Tunia, or its fruit. It grows erect, sometimes feet high, is spiny, and is much used for hedges in southern Europe. Its fruit, which is barrel-shaped and 2 or 3 inches long, is much eaten, fresh and dried. It is one of the foremost cochineal-plants, and is said to be the only species used for this production in the Canaries.

ta³ (tū'na-bl), a. [Also tuneable; < tune + able.] 1. Capable of being put in tune, or made harmonious.

God ringing the changes on all accidents, and making tun tunable to His glory.

Fuller, Holy State, IV. xiii. 12.

Harmonious; musical; tuneful. [Rare.]

More tuneable than lark to shepherd's ear.

Shak., M. N. D., i. 1. 184.

tunableness (tū'na-bl-nes), n. The state or quality of being tunable; harmony; melodiousness. Also tuneableness.

The tunableness and chiming of verse.

Swift, Advice to a Young Poet.

tunably (tū'na-bli), adv. In a tunable manner; harmoniously; musically. Also tuneably.

They can sing any thing most tunably, Sir, but Psalms.

Brome, Jovial Crew, i.

tun-bellied (tun'bel'id), a. Having a large protuberant belly; pot-bellied; paunchy.

Their great huge rowling tunbelly'd god Bacchus.

Cartwright, Royal Slave (1651). (Nares.)

tun-belly (tun'bel'i), n. A large protuberant belly.

A double chin and a tun-belly.

Tom Brown, Works, III. 152. (Davies.)

tun-dish (tun'dish), n. A funnel.

Filling a bottle with a tun-dish.

Shak., M. for M., III. 2. 182.

tundra (tōn'drā), n. [Also toondra; < Russ. tundra, a marshy plain.] In the northern part of Russia (both in Europe and in Asia), one of the nearly level treeless areas which occupy most of that region, and do not differ essentially from the steppes, except that, lying further north, their climate and vegetation are more decidedly arctic than those of the country to the south, with a corresponding increase in the number of small lakes and morasses.

A short distance south of Yefremov Kamen begins the variable tundra, a woodless plain, interrupted by no mountain heights, with small lakes scattered over it, and narrow valleys crossing it, which often make an excursion on the apparently level plain extremely tiresome.

Nordenskiöld, Voyage of the Vega (trans.), I. 377.

tundun (tun'dun), n. A toy: same as bull-roarer. tune (tūn), n. [< ME. tune, < OF. ton, F. ton = Pr. ton = Sp. ton, tono = It. tuono, < L. tonus, < Gk. τῶνος, a tone: see ton¹, of which tune is a doublet.] 1. A sound, especially a musical tone.

Leave your betraying smiles,
And change the tunes of your enticing tongue
To penitential prayers.

Fletcher (and another), Love's Cure, III. 3.

Whose senses in so evil consort their stepdame Nature lays
That ravishing delight in them most sweet tunes doth not raise.

Sir P. Sidney (Arber's Eng. Garner, i. 570).

2. A well-ordered and pleasing succession of tones; an air; a melody; especially, a brief melodic piece in simple metrical form. The term is often extended to include the harmony with which such a melody is accompanied. Specifically—3. A musical setting of a hymn, usually in four-part harmony, intended for use in public worship; a hymn-tune; chorale.—4. Same as canticle. Sometimes called an act.

tune.—5. Correct intonation in singing or playing on an instrument; capacity for producing tones in correct intonation; the proper construction or adjustment of a musical instrument with reference to such intonation; mutual adaptation of voices or instruments in pitch and temperament.

Like sweet bells jangled, out of tune and harsh.

Shak., Hamlet, III. 1. 166.

A continual Parliament (I thought) would but keep the Common-wealth in tune, by preserving Laws in their due execution and vigour.

Elkon Basilike, p. 27.

6. Frame of mind; mood; temper, especially temper for the time being; as, to be in tune (to be in the right disposition, or fit temper or humor).

The poor distressed Lear's 'I the town;

Who sometime, in his better tune, remembers

What we are come about. Shak., Lear, IV. 3. 41.

7. In phren., one of the perceptive faculties, of which the organ is said to be situated above the external angle of the orbit of the eye, as high as the middle of the forehead, on each side of the temporal ridge. This faculty is claimed to give the perception of melody or harmony.

See phrenology.—In tune, in correct or properly adjusted intonation; harmonious.—Out of tune, in incorrect or improperly adjusted intonation; inharmonious.—To change one's tune, to alter one's manner and way of talking.

O gin I live and brulk my life,

I'll gar ye change your tune.

Wedding of Robin Hood and Little John (Child's Ballads, (V. 184).

To sing another tune. See sing.—To the tune of, to the sum or amount of. [Colloq.]

Will Hazard has got the hipps, having lost to the tune of five hundred pound, tho' he understands play very well, no body better. Swift, Tatler, No. 230.

tune (tūn), v.; pret. and pp. tuned, ppr. tuning. [< tune, n. Cf. attune.] I. trans. 1. To adjust the tones of (a voice or a musical instrument) with reference to a correct or given standard of pitch or temperament. See tuning.

Tune your harps,

Ye angels, to that sound.

Dryden, Spanish Friar, II. 1.

2. To play upon; produce melody or harmony from.

When Orpheus tuned his lyre with pleasing woe, Rivers forgot to run, and winds to blow.

Addison, Epil. to Granville's British Enchanters.

3. To express by means of melody or harmony; celebrate in music.

Fountains, and ye that warble, as ye flow,

Melodious murmurs, warbling tune his praise.

Milton, P. L., v. 196.

4. To give a special tone or character to; attune.

To that high-sounding Lyre I tune my Strains.

Congreve, Pindaric Odes, i.

In peace, Love tunes the shepherd's reed.

Scott, L. of L. M., III. 2.

5. To put into a state proper for any purpose, or adapted to produce a particular effect.

Come, let me tune you; glaze not thus your eyes

With self-love of a vow'd virginity.

Massinger and Dekker, Virgin-Martyr, II. 3.

6. To bring into uniformity or harmony.

Elizabeth might silence or tune the pulpits; but it was impossible for her to silence or tune the great preachers of justice, and mercy, and truth.

J. R. Green, Short Hist. Eng., p. 456.

II. intrans. 1. To give forth musical sound.

Tuning to the water's fall,

The small birds sang to her.

Drayton, Quest of Cynthia.

2. To accord with some correct or given standard of pitch or temperament.—3. To utter inarticulate musical sounds with the voice; sing without using words; hum a tune. Imp. Dict. [Rare.]—To tune up, to begin to sing or play; as, birds tune up after a shower. [Colloq.]

tuneable, tuneableness, etc. See tunable, etc.

tuned (tūnd), a. [< tune + -ed².] Toned; usually in composition; as, a shrill-tuned bell.

tuneful (tū'fūl), a. [< tune + -ful.] Full of melody or tune. (a) Melodious; sweet of sound.

The tuneful voice was heard from high.

Dryden, Song for St. Cecilia's Day.

(b) Producing sweet sounds; musical.

The Minstrel was infirm and old; . . .

His tuneful brethren all were dead.

Scott, L. of L. M., Int.

tunefully (tūn'fūl-i), adv. In a tuneful manner; harmoniously; musically.

tunefulness (tūn'fūl-nes), n. The state or character of being tuneful.

tuneless (tūn'les), a. [< tune + -less.] 1. Unmusical; inharmonious.

How often have I led thy sportive choir,
With tuneless pipe, beside the murmuring Loire!
Goldsmith, Traveller, l. 244.

2. Not employed in or not capable of making music.

When in hand my tuneless harp I take,
Then does I more augment my foes despite.

Spenser, Sonnets, xlv.

3. Not expressed rhythmically or musically; silent; without voice or utterance.

On thy voiceless shore

The heroic lay is tuneless now;

The heroic bosom beats no more!

Byron, Don Juan, III. 86.

tuner (tū'nér), n. [< tune + -er¹.] 1. One who tunes or puts in tune; also, one who makes music or sings.

The pox of such antic, hisping, affecting fantasticoes, these new tuners of accents! Shak., R. and J., II. 4. 30.

Our mournful Philomel,

That rarest tuner,

Drayton, Shepherd's Sirena.

Specifically—2. One whose occupation it is to put musical instruments in proper tune and repair.

There are a good many blind tuners.

J. H. Ewing, Story of a Short Life, VIII.

3. In organ-building, an adjustable flap or opening near the top of a flue-pipe, whereby the effective length of the air-column may be altered, so as to alter the pitch of the tone.

tungt, n. An old spelling of tongue.

tung-oil (tung'oil), n. [< Chinese tung + E. oil.] A fixed oil obtained from the seeds of the tung-tree, Aleurites cordata, forming 35 per cent. of their weight. It is produced in immense quantities in China, where it is universally employed for calking and painting junks and boats, and for varnishing and preserving all kinds of woodwork. In drying quality it surpasses all other known oils. It is also used for lighting, but is inferior for the purpose to tea-oil. It is not known in European commerce. Also tree-oil or wood-oil.

Spens' Encyc. Manuf.

tun-great¹ (tun'grāt), a. [ME. tonne greet; < tun¹ + great.] Having a circumference of the size of a tun.

Every pillar, the temple to sustene,

Was tonne-greet, of iron bright and shene.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale, I. 1136.

tungstate (tung'stāt), n. [< tungst(ic) + -ate¹.] A salt of tungstic acid: as, tungstate of lime.—Sodium tungstate, a crystalline salt prepared by roasting wolfram with soda-ash. It is used as a mordant, and to render fabrics unflammable.

tungsten (tung'sten), n. [= F. tungstène = Sp. Pg. It. tungsteno = G. tungstein, < Sw. tungsten (= Dan. tungsteen), < tung, heavy, = Dan. tung = Icel. thungr, heavy (cf. thungi, a load, thunga, load), + sten, stone, = Dan. steen = G. stein = E. stone, q. v.] 1. Chemical symbol, W; atomic weight, 184.4. A metal some of whose ores have long been known (see wolfram and scheelite), but they were supposed to be compounds of tin.

That scheelite (tungstate of lime) was a compound of lime with a peculiar metallic acid was proved by Scheele and Bergman in 1781, and the composition of wolfram was also determined by the brothers d'Elhuyar a few years later. Metallic tungsten, as obtained by the reduction of the trioxide, is a gray powder having a metallic luster and a specific gravity of 19.129 (Roscoe). The most interesting fact in regard to tungsten is that tungsteniferous minerals, especially wolfram, are very frequent associates of the ores of tin. (See wolfram.) Tungsten has been experimented with in various ways, as in improving the quality of steel by being added to it in small quantity; but no alloy containing tungsten has come into general use. (See tungsten steel, under steel.) A new alloy called sideraphite, containing a large percentage of iron, with some nickel, aluminum, and copper, together with 4 per cent. of tungsten, has recently been introduced; this is said to resemble silver, and to be very ductile and malleable and not easily attacked by acids. Another alloy called minargit, consisting chiefly of copper and nickel, is said sometimes to contain a small percentage of tungsten. Tungsten is chemically related to molybdenum and uranium. Certain chemically remarkable compounds of tungsten (tungstates with tungsten dioxide) have been employed as substitutes for bronze-powder.

2. The native tungstic acid of lime.—Tungsten steel. See steel.

tungstenic (tung-sten'ik), a. [< tungsten + -ic.] Of or pertaining to or procured from tungsten; tungstic.

tungsteniferous (tung-sten-if'e-rus), a. Containing tungsten.

tungstic (tung'stik), a. [< tungst(en) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to or obtained from tungsten.

—Tungstic acid, an acid obtained by precipitating a solution of tungstic acid in an alkali by the addition of an acid. It is dibasic, having the composition H₂WO₄.

—Tungstic ocher. Same as tungstite.

tungstite (tung'stīt), n. [< tungst(en) + -ite².] Native oxide of tungsten, occurring in pulverulent form, of a bright-yellow color, usually in connection with wolfram, the tungstate of iron and manganese. Also called tungstic ocher.

tungstous (tung'stus), a. Same as tungstic.
tung-tree (tung'trē), n. [< Chinese tung + E. tree.] The Chinese varnish- or oil-tree, Aleurites cordata, extensively grown in China for its oil product. See tung-oil.

Tungusic (tung-gō'sik), a. A designation applied to a group of Ural-Altaic or Scythian tongues spoken by tribes in the northeast of Asia. The most prominent dialect is the Manchu, spoken by the tribes who conquered China in 1644.

tunhoof (tun'hōf), n. The ground-ivy, Nepeta Glechoma.

tunic (tū'nik), n. [*< ME. tunike (?) (cf. tunicle) (cf. AS. tunice, tunice = OHG. tunihhā); < OF. (and F.) tunique = Pr. Sp. Pg. tunica = It. tonica, < L. tunica, a tunic.] 1. In Rom. antiq., a garment like a shirt or gown worn by either sex, very often an undergarment; hence a general term applied to garments, of all periods and materials, which are worn depending from the neck, whether girded at the waist or not, or kept in place by other garments worn outside of them, and whether such garments are long and full or short and scant. Thus, the name is given to the Greek chiton in its various forms, to the early English garment worn under the cloak, and even to the hauberk of mail. In the breast of the tunic of the ancient Roman senator a broad vertical stripe of purple (called latus clavi) was worn; the equites wore two narrow parallel stripes (called angusti clavi) extending from the shoulders to the bottom of the tunic. Hence the terms laticlavii and angusticlavii applied to persons of these orders. See also cut under stola.

Tunic or Chiton of Ionian form (over it is girded the Dionysiac nebris or fawn-skin), from a Greek amphora of the 4th century B.C., found at Perugia. (From "Monumenti dell' Instituto.")

Tunic or Tunicat, a Jerkin, Jacket, or sleeveless coat, formerly worn by Princes. Blount, Glossographia (1670).
 2. At the present time, a garment generally loose, but gathered or girded at the waist, worn by women, usually an outer garment; a sort of wrap or coat for street wear.

Her Majesty wore a white satin petticoat, over which was a silver llama tunic, trimmed with silver and white blonde lace. First Year of a Silken Reign, p. 230.

3. Ecceles, a vestment worn over the alb in the Roman Catholic Church and in some Anglican churches by the subdeacon or epistler at the celebration of the mass or holy communion. It is similar in shape and color to the dalmatic, but sometimes smaller and with less ornamentation. The bishop's tunic is worn under the dalmatic, and is shorter than the subdeacon's. See tunicle.

4. A military surcoat.—5. In the British army, the ordinary fatigue-coat; applied usually to the coat of a private, but sometimes to that of an officer. [Colloq.]

"Please show me your Victoria Cross." "It's on my tunic, and that's in my trunks in camp."

J. H. Evers, Story of a Short Life, vii.

6. A natural covering; an integument. Specifically—(a) In anat., a covering or investing part; a tunic; a coat, as of the eyeball, the stomach, or an artery. See tunica. (b) In zool., one of the layers forming the covering of an ascidian. See Tunicata (with cut), and cut under Ascidia. (c) In bot., any loose membranous skin not formed from epidermis; the skin of a seed; also, the peridium of certain fungi.—Albuginous tunic. Same as albuginea.—Arachnoid tunic. Same as arachnoid. 3.—Inner tunic, in bot., a membrane, more or less colored, which surrounds the nucleus or hymenium in the genus Verrucaria, situated immediately beneath the perithecium. Leighton, Brit. Lichens.—Ruyschian tunic. Same as chorioepithelialis.—Talaric tunic. See talaric, and Ionian chiton, under chiton.—Vaginal tunic. See vaginal and eye, 1.

tunica (tū'ni-kā), n.; pl. tunicæ (-sē). [NL., < L. tunica, tunic; see tunic.] Same as tunic.—Tunica abdominalis, the aponeuroses of the abdominal muscles of some animals, as the horse, forming a strong fascia or sheet for the support of the abdominal viscera.—Tunica adnata, one of the coats of the eyeball, lying between the sclerotic proper and the conjunctiva. It is the expansion of fibrous tissue, or aponeurosis, whereby the muscles of the eyeball are inserted into the sclerotic. Also called adnata, tunica albuginea.—Tunica adventitia. See adventitia.—Tunica albuginea. Same as albuginea.

—Tunica arachnoidea. (a) The arachnoid membrane, a thin membrane forming one of the coverings of the brain and spinal cord. (b) One of the layers of the choroid coat of the eye.—Tunica chorioepithelialis. Same as chorioepithelialis.—Tunica conjunctiva. Same as conjunctiva, 1.—Tunica cornea pellucida. Same as cornea, 1.—Tunica granulosa, the granular lining of the cavity of a Graafian follicle.—Tunica intima. Same as intima.—Tunica muscularis mucosæ, a thin and at places incomplete layer of smooth muscle-fibers in the mucous membrane of the alimentary canal. Also called simply muscularis mucosæ.—Tunica propria, in anat.: (a) The proper coat of some structure, as an artery; the layer which specially constitutes such a structure, as distinguished from other layers which may form a part of it by investing or lining it. The tunica propria of the spleen is a strong elastic connective-tissue coat lying immediately beneath the serous coat; that of the testis is defined under tunica vaginalis testis. (b) Specifically, the membrane lining the bony labyrinth of the ear; the walls of the membranous labyrinth.—Tunica reflexa, the outer wall of the tunica vaginalis testis.—Tunica Ruyschiana. Same as chorioepithelialis.—Tunica vaginalis oculi, a sheathing fascia which surrounds the optic nerve and part of the eyeball, formed of fascia.—Tunica vaginalis testis, the serous investment of the testicle, formed of a pouch or process of the peritoneum, usually a shut sac; it has two walls, the tunica propria, upon the testis itself, and the tunica reflexa, separated from this by the cavity.—Tunica vasculosa Halleri. Same as chorioepithelialis.—Tunica vasculosa testis, the plexus of the testicle, a vascular layer underlying the tunica albuginea.

Tunicata (tū'ni-kā'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of tunicatus, clothed with a tunic; see tunicate.] A class, superclass, or phylum of animals intermediate between and connecting the invertebrates with the true vertebrates, now made a prime division of chordate animals (see Chordata); the ascidians, tunicaries, or sea-squirts. The evidence of vertebrate affinity or character is chiefly in the larval state, when there is a sort of notochord, the urochord (see Urochorda), which in one group persists in the adult (see Appendiculariidae). The tunicates are so called from the thick, tough, leathery integument or tunic the name having been given by Lamarck in 1816 to the forms then known, and the class having been placed in his system between the worms and the radiates. The tunicates had before been regarded as polyps or even as sponges; with Cuvier they formed a division (Nuda) of mollusks; afterward and for many years they were considered as mollusoids, and associated with or approximated to the brachiopods and bryozoa. The discovery of the urochord by Kowalevsky in 1866 gave the first evidence of their proper position among chordate animals, and consequently of their vertebrate affinity. They were thereupon regarded as the "ancestors" of the vertebrates, of which, however, they appear rather to represent a degenerate or retrograde side-shoot. The developmental history of the intricate and perplexing Alteutherozoa of zoology has been determined for the whole group, and some members of it occur under two distinct forms. One of the most remarkable peculiarities of Tunicata is the presence in the integument of tunicin, a kind of animal cellulose—cellulose having been supposed to be peculiar to plants. Tunicates are very dissimilar to one another in outward appearance, though they conform to a type of structure most parts of which can be clearly traced to the type of vertebrates. An ordinary simple ascidian resembles a leathern bottle fixed to the base, and provided with two openings, through one of which water is drawn, and through the other of which it can be expelled with some force when the animal contracts, whence the name sea-squirt; other fanciful names are sea-pear, sea-peach, sea-pork, and sea-potato. Other tunicates, also fixed, are social, aggregate, or colonial; some are free-swimming, or fixed and free at different stages of their development, and of the free forms some are simple and others are linked in chains. The salps and pyrosomes are phosphorescent. All tunicates are marine; most live on the sea or surface, but some at great depths. Their classification has been almost as changeable as their location in the system. The arrangement of H. Milne Edwards (1826), and long current with little modification) has been entirely remodelled. According to the latest views, Tunicata rank as a class divided into three orders: (a) Larvata, tailed when adult, represented by the family Appendiculariidae (see cut under Appendicularia); (b) Thaliacea, free-swimming, simple or compound, without a tail in the adult, and either cyclomarian (Doliolidae) or hemimarian (Salpidae and Ocyropsidae) (see cuts under Doliolidae and Salpidae); and (c) Ascidacea, of which there are three groups or suborders:—(1) Salpinoidea, resembling salps in being free-swimming, colonial, and luminous, with one family, Pyrosomidae; (2) Composite, fixed, reproducing by gemmation and so forming compound organisms, with seven families, of which Botryllidae is the best-known, a member of it having been described in 1756; and (3) Simplex, fixed (exceptionally free) and solitary (rarely social)—that is, imperfectly composite, with four families, Molgidae, Cynthidae, Ascididae, and Clavelinidae. The last named are the social ascidians; the second and third families are each divided into subfamilies ranked as families by some writers, and are also the largest families, represented by the numerous genera and species which come most frequently under observation, and to which the common name ascidian is specially pertinent. (See cuts under Ascidia and gastrolatula.) A former broader arrangement which ignored the peculiarities of the Larvata, was into two orders, by means of which the salps and the doliolids on the one hand were contrasted with all other tunicates on the other; and each of these orders had a number of different names. Also called Ascidoida.

tunicate (tū'ni-kāt), a. and n. [< L. tunicatus, pp. of tunicare, clothe with a tunic, < tunica, tunic; see tunic.] 1. a. 1. In zool., coated; covered with tunics or integuments; specifically, enveloped in membranous integuments or tunics as an ascidian; or of pertaining to the Tunicata; tunicated.—2. In entom., covered one another, like a set of thimbles, as the joints of some antennæ.—3. In bot., covered with a tunic or membrane; coated.—Tunicate club or capitulum of an antenna, a club or capitulum formed of tunicate joints, the outer joints being visible only at the end.—Tunicate joints, in entom., joints set one into another like funnels.

II. n. 1. a. Tunic. Blount.—2. An ascidian, tunicary, or sea-squirt; any member of the Tunicata.

tunicated (tū'ni-kā-ted), a. [< tunicate + -ed.] Same as tunicate.—Tunicated bulb, a bulb composed of numerous concentric coats, as an onion.

tunicin (tū'ni-sin), n. [< tunic(ate) + -in.] The peculiar substance, resembling if not identical with vegetable cellulose, found in the integument of the tunicates; animal cellulose. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 609.

tunicle (tū'ni-kl), n. [*< ME. tunicle, < OF. tunicle, < L. tunica, dim. of tunica, tunic; see tunic.] 1. A tunic; especially, a fine, thin, or delicate tunic; a slight coat or covering.

The humours and tunicles (of the eye) are transparent, to let in colours, and therefore tintured with none themselves. Evelyn, True Religion, I. 34.

2. Ecceles, same as tunic, 3. When used in the plural it signifies both the dalmatic and the tunic. Also spelled tunacle.

Where there be many Priests, or Deacons, there so many shalbe ready to help the Priest, as shalbe requisite. And shall have asen them bykysse the vestures appointed for their ministry—that is to saye, Albes, with tunicles. Book of Common Prayer, Edw. VI., 1549 (ed. Pickering), fol. 101. (The Supper of the Lord).

tuning (tū'ning), n. [Verbal n. of tune, v.] The act, process, or result of adjusting the intonation of a musical instrument. The process varies with the mechanical construction of the instrument. In stringed instruments, like the pianoforte, violin, harp, etc., it consists in adjusting the tension of the strings by means of tuning-pins or pegs. In wind-instruments, like the flute, clarinet, trumpet, etc., it consists in adjusting the length of the tube by means of some kind of sliding joint or crook, so that the fundamental tone of the tube shall be correct. In a bell it consists in adjusting the thickness of the sound-bow. In the organ it consists in various adjustments of the effective length of the air column in flue-pipes, or of the vibrating part of the reed in reed-pipes. The intricacy of the process depends chiefly on the number of separate tones whose intonation is fixed and is most conspicuous in instruments with a keyboard, like the organ and the pianoforte. On these instruments some system of compromise temperament is a necessity if freedom of modulation is desired. Accordingly, great pains are taken to set the temperament in a single centesimal octave, and all other octaves are then adjusted thereto. Tuning is much facilitated by the phenomenon of beats, especially in the case of the organ. See temperament and beat, 1.—Flat or French flat tuning, one of the methods of tuning a lute: so called because the French pitch was lower than that elsewhere used.—Pythagorean tuning. See Pythagorean.

tuning-cone (tū'ning-kōn), n. A cone of brass usually hollow, used in tuning metal organ pipes. When the pitch is to be raised the point of the cone is driven into the top of the pipe so as to increase its flare, and when the pitch is to be lowered the base of the cone is driven over the top of the pipe so as to decrease its flare. Also tuning-horn.

tuning-crook (tū'ning-krūk), n. In musical instruments of the brass wind group, a crook or loop of tube which may be inserted to change the fundamental tone of the tube.

tuning-fork (tū'ning-fōrk), n. A steel instrument with two prongs, designed to produce when struck, a musical tone of some particular pitch. Its invention is ascribed to John Shore, in the middle of the eighteenth century. Tuning-forks are particularly useful because their tone is comparatively free from harmonics, and because their pitch is not disturbed by ordinary changes of temperature. They are therefore much employed in acoustical investigation and

5. A tunnel-net.—6. An arched drain. [Prov.
Eng.]—7. A gallery, passage, or roadway beneath the ground, under the bed of a stream, or through a hill or mountain. Tunnels are used in military operations, in mining, in conveying water, and as passageways for vehicles and railway-trains. They are of various construction, according to the character of the soil through which they pass. In soft silt or sand, as in silt, a tunnel beneath a stream, the interior of the tunnel is lined with brickwork, with, in some instances, a shield of plate-iron outside the bricks. In soil, soft rock, or quicksands, heavy masonry lining is sometimes required. In solid rock a simple excavation is generally sufficient, as in many of the shorter railroad-tunnels. The section of a tunnel is usually a cylindrical or elliptical arch, with, sometimes, raised ends or inverted arch below. The earlier modern tunnels were excavated by hand-drilling and blasting; but now, when drilling, by means of compressed air, has been used, the great perfection, and the rate of progression has been increased and the cost of excavation reduced. In the Greathead system of tunneling, the tunnel is made by the use of a cylindrical shield driven forward by hydraulic pressure; the excavation is lined with a cast-iron shell, and the interspace between the shell and the sides of the excavation is lined with grout forced in by air-pressure.

The shell is made of segments bolted together. Silt and mud are forced through doors in the face of the shield, and excavated material is taken out through air-lights in the bulkhead of the tunnel. The longest railroad-tunnel is the St. Gotthard, through the Alps (about 9 miles); the longest in the United States is the Hoosac tunnel, in western Massachusetts (4½ miles).

8. In mining, any level or drift in a mine open at one end, or which may serve for an adit. See adit, 1.—9. In zoöl., the underground burrow of some animals, when long and tortuous, as of the mole or of the gopher.—
Pilot tunnel, a device for directing a tunnel in the prescribed grade, consisting of a dangled tube made up of interchangeable plates, which can be bolted to the shield and forced concentrically into the silt in advance of the face of the heading. From this measurements in any direction can be made to limit the cutting to the proper dimensions and distance from the center.—Tunnel of tunnus*, < Gr. θύνος, thynoc, a tunny, prob. lit.

'darter,' < θύνω, dart along.] A scombroid fish of the genus Orcynus, as O. thynnus. The germon, or long-finned tunny, is O. gerno or alonga. (See cut under albacore.) The true tunny of the Mediterranean and Atlantic waters has been the object of an important fishery, systematically conducted from remote antiquity, as by the Phœnicians, to the present day. It is one of the largest food-fishes, growing to a length of 10 feet, and acquiring a weight of one thousand pounds or more. It is a near relative of the bonito and albacore, but is distinguished from the latter by the much shorter pectoral fins;
the body is deepest about the middle, whence it tapers rapidly to a slender caudal peduncle; there are eight or nine short separate finlets behind the dorsal and anal fins;
the dorsals are two, of which the first rises high in front;
the caudal fin is very short, but its upper and under lobes extend high and low. The color is dark-bluish above, and below grayish, irregularly silvery. The tunny is a fish of the high seas, but periodically wanders in large shoals coastwise. The flesh is eaten fresh, or preserved in salt or in oil.

ing several species of India, the Malay peninsula, and various Malayan islands. They are pretty little creatures of arboreal habits, with long bushy tails, feeding upon fruits and insects, with the general aspect and manners of squirrels. Some are called banzang and tana. Also written Tupaia, Tupaia.

Tupaia (tū-pā-i'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Tupaia + -idae.] A family of squirrel-like arboreal and diurnal insectivorous mammals. They have a developed cecum, a comparatively large brain-case, completed orbits, large zygomatic arches, bullate tympanic bones, tibia and fibula separate, the pubic symphysis long, the hind limbs moderately exceeding the fore in length, and thirty-eight teeth. There are at least 2 genera, Tupaia, the banzangs, and Ptilocercus, the pentails, inhabiting Asia and Malaysia, with several species. See cuts under Ptilocercus and Tupaia. Also Tupaia.

tupelo (tū'pe-lō), n. [Amer. Ind.] One of several species of Nyssa, most commonly N. sylvestrica (N. multiflora), the pepperidge, sour-gum, or black-gum. See black-gum, and cut under Nyssa. The sour tupelo is N. capitata, otherwise called gopher-plum and Ogeches time. (See time.) The large tupelo, cotton- or tupelo-gum, is N. undulata, a large tree of deep swamps and river-bottoms in the southern United States. Its wood, which is light, soft, and unweaveable, is used in turnery, largely for woodenware, for wooden shoes, etc.; that of the root is used for the floats of nets. Sargent.—Tupelo tent, a small rod of tupelo which is inserted into the mouth of the womb when it is desired to dilate this passage. The tupelo effects this by increasing in size through absorption of the fluids of the parts.

Tupistra (tū-pis'trā), n. [NL. (Ker, 1814), so called from the shape of the stigma; < Gr. τύρις, or τύρις, a mallet, < τύριον, strike: see type.] A genus of liliaceous plants, of the tribe Aspidistreae. It is characterized by flowers in a dense cylindrical spike with spreading perianth-lobes, and a thick peltate stigma which is deeply lobed or is nearly entire and closes the throat of the flower. There are 3 or 4 species, natives of Burma and of the Himalayas. They are perennial herbs, with long ample leaves contracted into an erect petiole, growing from a thick rhizome which is either elongated or short and tuberous. The violet or scarious bracts upon an erect or recurved scape. They are known as mallet-flower. T. squalida, the original species, and T. nutans, the nodding mallet-flower, are sometimes cultivated under glass.

tup-man (tup'man), n. A breeder of or dealer in tups. [Local, Eng.]

tupsee (tup'sē), n. The mango-fish, Polynemus paradoxus.

tuque (tik), n. [Canadian F. form of F. toque, a cap: see toque.] A cap worn in Canada. See the quotation.

a, folded to fit the head; b, as knitted.

But the tuque is disappearing, we are sorry to say, and ordinary caps are taking its place. It alone served to mark the habitant. It is something like a long stocking, knit and closed at both ends, and one end being pushed into the other to double it, it is drawn over the head, down the back of the neck, and indeed over the whole face and shoulders if necessary. . . . The sash . . . has been adopted as an ornamental and useful appendage by the citizens; and the snow-shoe clubs have adopted the tuque.

tu quoque (tū kwō'kwē). [< L. tu quoque, 'thou too,' i. e. 'you have done the same thing,' or 'you're another': tu = E. thou; quoque, also, too, perhaps orig. quomque*, < quom, quum, as, when, + -que, and.] A retort consisting of a charge or accusation similar to that which has been made by one's antagonist, as in the case of a person charged with bribery who replies that his accuser's hands are not clean of corruption: also used attributively: as, the tu quoque argument is not conclusive.

tur (tör), n. The urus.

turacin (tō'rā-sin), n. [< turacou, touracou, + -in.] The red or crimson coloring matter of the feathers of the turakoo. In solution turacin gives two absorption-bands of its spectrum like those of oxyhemoglobin. It contains about six per cent. of copper, which cannot be isolated without destroying the pigment. Turacin is said to wash out more or less during the rainy season, leaving the feathers that were scarlet of a pinkish white.

turacou, n. See turakoo.

turacoverdin (tū'rā-kō-vēr'din), n. [< turaco + F. vert, green (see verd), + -in.] The green coloring matter of the feathers of the turakoo.

Turacus (tū'rā-kus), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1800), < F. touraco or touracou.] A genus of turakoes, now restricted to species with feathered nostrils, as T. persa, T. corythaix, and about 12 others. It has several synonyms, the most prominent of which is Corythaix (Illiger, 1811). Also Touraco.

turakoo (tō'rā-kō), n. [Also turako, turaco, tourakoo, touracou, touraco, etc. (NL. Turacus); an African name.] A bird of the family Musophagidae and any of the genera Turacus (or Corythaix), Schizorhis, etc.; a kind of plantain-eater: sometimes extended to all the birds of this family. The species are numerous, all African, of large size and striking appearance. In the members of the genus Turacus the plumage is mostly bright-green and rich-red, and there is an elegant helmet-like crest which the birds instantly erect when excited or alarmed. They live in the woods in small companies, and their voice is very loud and harsh. One of the best-known is T. corythaix, the white-crested turakoo of South Africa. The Senegal turakoo is T. persa. Another is Schizorhis africanus of West Africa. The gray turakoo is a plainer species, S. concolor, of South Africa. The giant turakoo, Corythaix cristata (formerly Turacus giganteus, T. cristatus, Musophaga cristata, etc., the blue curassow of Latham, 1823), is a plantain-eater very near the species of Musophaga proper, with oval exposed nostrils, and a helmet crest; the plumage is chiefly verditer-blue, without crimson; the tail has a broad black subterminal bar; the bill is yellow and scarlet; the eyes are red; the total length is 25 inches. This turakoo inhabits West and Central Africa.

Giant Turakoo (Corythaix cristata).

Turanian (tū-rā'ni-an), a. and n. [< Turan (see Iranian) + -ian.] A word loosely and indefinitely used to designate a family of languages, sometimes applied to the Asiatic languages in general outside of the Indo-European and Semitic families, and so including various discordant and independent families, but sometimes used especially or restrictedly of the Ural-Altaic or Scythian family.

Turbellaria (tēr-be-lā'ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., called in allusion to the currents caused by the moving cilia; < L. turba, a crowd, + -ella-aria.] A class of worms, or an order of flatworms, characterized by the ciliation of the body, by means of which they set up little currents or vortices of water; the whirlworm. The name was given in 1831 by Ehrenberg to worms which had long been known as planarians (see Planaria), and was a mere substitute for or synonym of the earlier designation. It has been used with various extensions and restrictions, and has included the nemertean or so-called rhynchocelous turbellarians (see Nemertea). These are now excluded, and the Turbellaria, as an order of flatworms, are those whose body is ciliated and which have mouth and with few exceptions an alimentary canal, no anus. Most of them fall in the two main divisions, rhachocelous and dendrocelous turbellarians, according to the simple or branched condition of the alimentary canal. They are mainly free-swimming worms, some of microscopic size, others several inches long; some forms habit fresh and others salt water. See cuts under Dendrocelia, Rhachocelia, and Rhynchocelia.

II. a. A member of the class Turbellaria.

turbellariform (tēr-be-lā'ri-fōrm), a. [< N. Turbellaria, q. v. + L. forma, form.] Like likened to a turbellarian: as, the turbellariform larva of Balanoglossus.

turbethi, n. An obsolete form of turpeth.

turbid (tēr'bid), a. [< L. turbidus, disturbed turbare, disturb, < turba, mass, throng, crowd, tumult, disturbance. From the same source is E. disturb, trouble, turbine, etc.] 1. Properly having the lees disturbed; in a more general se. muddy; foul with extraneous matter; ek; not clear: used of liquids of any kind, or color.

ough their stream is loaded with sand, and turbid h alluvial waste. O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, iii.

grim man in a flannel shirt, hatless and with turbid red e. George Eliot, Felix Holt, xxx.

turbidæ (tér'bi-dē), n. pl. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1840), irreg. < Turbo + -idæ.] Same as Turbin-.

turbidity (tér-bid'i-ti), n. [= Sp. turbiedad = turbidita; < turbid + -ity.] The state of being turbid; turbidness.

turbidly (tér'bid-li), adv. 1. In a turbid or mud-manner.—2. With disorder or roughness; astersously; vehemently. [Rare.]

A person of small merit is anxiously jealous of imputations on his honour; . . . one of great merit turbidly re- its them.

Young, Estimation of Human Life. (Richardson.)

turbidness (tér'bid-nes), n. The state or qual- y of being turbid; turbidity.

turbillon (tér-bil'yon), n. [F. tourbillon = u. turbion = Pg. turbilhão, < L. turbo (turbin-), whirl, whirlwind, hurricane: see turbine.] A birl; a vortex.

Each of them is a sun, moving on its own axis, in the ntre of its own vortex or turbillon.

Steele, Spectator, No. 472.

turbinacea (tér-bi-nā'sē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Turbin- (Turbin-) + -acea.] Same as Turbinidæ. La- arch, 1822.

turbineaceous (tér-bi-nā'shius), a. [Erroneous m for turbaceous*, < ML. turba, turf, + -ceous.] Of or belonging to turf or peat; turfy; eaty. [Rare.]

The real turbineaceous flavour no sooner reached the nose f the Captain than the beverage was turned down his roat with symptoms of most unequivocal applause.

Scott, St. Ronan's Well, xiii.

turbinal (tér'bi-nal), a. and n. [L. turbo (turbin-), a top, < -al.] I. a. Same as turbinate.

II. n. In zool. and anat.: (a) A turbinate one: one of the spongy or scroll-like bones of the nasal passages specified as ethmoturbinal, vasilloturbinal, and sphenoturbinal (see the distinctive names). See turbinate, and the phrases here. (b) In the Ophidia, a bone of the skull iffident from (a). See the quotation, and cut nder Pythonidæ.

Forming the floor of the front part of the nasal cham- er, on each side, is a large concavo-convex bone, which xtends from the ethmoidal septum to the maxilla, p- roects the nasal gland, and is commonly termed a turbinal; hough, if it be a membrane-bone, it does not truly corre- spond with the turbinals of the higher Vertebrata.

Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 204.

Alnasal turbinal. See alinasal.

turbinate (tér'bi-nāt), a. [= F. turbiné = Sp. g. turbinado = It. turbinato, < L. turbinatus, -shaped like a top or cone, < turbo (turbin-), a op; see turbine.] 1. Shaped like a whipping-

op. Specifically—(a) In bot., shaped like a top or a cone nverted; narrow at the base and broad at the apex: as, turbinate germ, nectary, or pericarp. (b) In conch., spiral, is a univalve shell; whorled from a broad base to an apex.

2. In anat., whorled or scroll-like in shape; turbinal; spongy in texture, or full of cavities: applied to certain bones and parts of bones in the nasal fosse.—3. Whirling in the manner of a top.—Inferior turbinate bone, a distinct bone attached to the nasal surface of the superior maxillary bone, separating the middle from the inferior nasal fosse; the maxilloturbinal. See cuts under mouth and nasal.

Middle turbinate bone, an indefinite lower section of the lateral mass of the ethmoid.—Superior turbinate bone, an indefinite upper part of the lateral mass of the ethmoid. The superior and middle turbinate bones, taken together, are the ethmoturbinal bones. See cuts nder mouth and nasal.—Turbinate crest. See turbinated crest under crest.—Turbinate process. See process.

turbinate (tér'bi-nāt), v.; pret. and pp. *turbin-*ated, ppr. turbinating. [L. turbinatus, like a top; see turbinate, a.] I. trans. To fashion like a top. Bailey, 1731.—Turbinated crest. See crest.

II. intrans. To revolve like a top; spin; whirl. [Rare.]

turbinate-lentiform (tér'bi-nāt-len'ti-fōrm), a. In bot., between turbinate and lentiform in shape.

turbation (tér-bi-nā'shon), n. [*L. turbina-*to = n.], a pointing in the form of a cone, shaped like a top, < turbinatus, cone-shaped: see turbinate, a.] 1. The act of turbinating, or the state of being turbinate. Bailey, 1727.—2. That which is turbinate; a whorled or scroll-like formation, as a shell.

turbine (tér'bin), n. [F. turbine = Sp. tur- bina, turbine, = It. turbine, a whirlwind, < L.

turbo (turbin-), also turben, anything that whirls around, a wheel, a top, a whirlwind, < turbare, disturb, move, < turba, disturbance, uproar, turmoil, also a crowd: see tur- bid.] A water-wheel driven by the impact or reaction of a flowing stream of water, or by impact and reaction combined. Turbines are usually horizontally rotating wheels on vertical shafts. They are of various constructions, and may be divided into reaction-turbines, or those actuated substantially by the reaction of the water passing through them (their buckets moving in a direction opposite to that of the flow);

impulse-turbines, or those principally driven by impact against their blades or buckets (the buckets moving with the flow); and combined reaction and impulse wheels, which include the best modern types of turbines. They are also distinguished, by the manner in which they discharge the water, into outward, vertical, or cen- tral-discharge wheels. In some types of turbines the discharge is partly vertical and partly central. Such is the case with the wheel shown in the cut, which is constructed and set so that the water enters at the periphery of the case. By the modern turbine a very high percentage of the potential energy of water is converted into work while passing through the wheel. Compare cut under scroll.—

Air-turbine, a wheel of turbine form driven by wind, or air ejected from a pipe or tube.—Journal-turbine, a a, cylinder; b, lower flange of case; c, gates, which also act as guides to direct the flow upon the buckets, and which are pivoted medially to balance the hydrostatic pressure upon them; d, upper flange, or crown-plate; e, gate-pinion which works with the toothed segment f, connected by an arm with the gate-arm hub g; h, h, gate-rods pivoted at their inner ends to g, and at their outer ends to the gates c, f, by which mechanism the turning of the pinion e causes the opening or closing of the gates; i, gate-pinion shaft, either operated independently or controlled by a governor for regulating the flow of water to the buckets; j, sleeve, which is held by the bush k and set-screws on the shaft l, the sleeve holding the gate-hub in position; m, clutch-coupling for connecting with a shaft for transmitting power. A is a vertical section, with two diagrams, showing bridge-tree n, which carries the locust or lignum-vite step p, fitted to a concave bearing in the bottom of the shaft l. It also shows the upper and central discharge-buckets q, and the lower and vertical discharge-buckets r.

turbine having a downward discharge, as distinguished from those in which the discharge is outward, oblique, combined, etc.—Steam turbine, a turbine impelled by steam-jets, the steam impinging upon vanes or buckets on the circumference of a rotating disk or cylinder. The steam turbine has come into common use, and competes, in its economical performance, with the simpler and less economical types of standard steam-engine.

turbine-dynamometer (tér'bin-dī-na-mom'e-tér), n. In hydraulic engin., a modification of the Prony brake, which adapts that device for application to vertical shafts or to horizontally revolving wheels on vertical shafts. It is used more especially for testing the power delivered from turbines (whence the name). A spring-scale is used instead of a weight in applying the brake-band. Compare Prony's dynamometer.

Turbinnella (tér-bi-nel'ā), n. [NL. (Lamarck, 1799), < Turbo (Turbin-) + dim. term., -ella.]

The typical genus of the family Turbinellidæ. T. pyrum is the famous chank (which see, with cut).

Turbinellidæ (tér-bi-nel'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Turbinella + -idæ.]

A family of large marine gastropods, whose typical genus is Turbinella; the so-called false volutes, turnip-shells, or pap-boats. The principal genus, besides the type, is Cynodonta (or Vaxum).

turbinelloid (tér-bi-nel'oid), a. Of or relating to the family Turbinellidæ.

turbine-pump (tér'bin-pump), n. A pump in which water is raised by the action of a turbine-wheel driven by exterior power in the opposite direction from that in which it turns when used as a motor. Also called propeller-pump. Compare turbine.

Turbinidæ (tér-bin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Turbo (Turbin-) + -idæ.] A family of scutibranchiate gastropods, whose typical genus is Turbo. The stony opercula of some of the species are known as eye-stones and sea-beans. Various kinds of turbinids are polished and much used as mantel-ornaments, etc., under the name of wreath-shells. The family has been variously limited, and is now usually restricted to the numerous species, of all seas but especially of tropical ones, which have a long cirrus appendage of the foot, a pair of intertentacular lobes, and eleven radular teeth in each cross-row. The shell is generally turbinate or trochiform and highly nacreous, and its aperture is closed with a thick calcareous operculum whose nucleus is centric or eccentric. See cuts under Turbo and Imperator. Also Turbidæ, Turbinacea.

turbiniform (tér'bi-ni-fōrm), a. [L. turbo (turbin-), a wheel, top, < forma, form.] Top-shaped, as a shell; having turbinate whorls or spire; resembling or related to the Turbinidæ; turbinoid.

turbinite (tér'bi-nīt), n. [L. turbo (turbin-), a top, < -ite.] A fossil shell of the family Turbinidæ, or some similar shell. Also turbite.

turbinoid (tér'bi-noid), a. [L. turbo (turbin-), a top, < Gr. eidōs, form.] Top-shaped; turbiniform; spirally coiled, wreathed, or whorled, as the turns of a shell. Specifically applied—(a) To shells, whether of foraminifers, gastropods, or cephalopods, whose whorls rise in a conical or conoidal figure, as compared with shells coiled flat in one plane. (b) To gastropods resembling or related to the Turbinidæ.

turbit, n. An obsolete form of turbot.

turbit² (tér'bit), n. [Origin unknown.] A breed of domestic pigeons with white body and colored wings, ruffled breast, very short stout beak, flattened head, and peak-crest or shell-crest or both. There are several color-varieties; some are whole-colored.

turbite (tér'bit), n. [L. turbo, a wheel, top, < -ite.] Same as turbinite.

turbith¹ (tér'bit), n. Same as turpeth.

turbitteen (tér'bi-tēn'), n. [L. turbit² + -teen as in sateen, velveteen, etc.] A strain of domestic pigeons of the turbit breed, which occurs in several colors.

Turbo (tér'bō), n. [NL., < L. turbo (turbin-), a whirl, wheel, top; see turbine.] 1. The typical genus of the family Turbinidæ, formerly very extensive, now restricted to species with a regularly turbinate shell, rounded aperture, smooth beveled columellar lip, and a calcareous operculum with a central or subcentral nucleus. Some attain considerable size, and when polished show beautiful colors, as green, red, and pearly-white, the last highly iridescent with nacreous luster. Various species, as T. sarmaticus and T. marmoratus, are common purloir-ornaments. See sea-bean, 3, and cut under operculum.

2. [L. c.] A shell of this genus.

turbot (tér'bot), n. [Early mod. E. also turbet, turbit, turbutte, etc.; < ME. turbote, turbut (= MD. turbot, terbot, tarbot, D. turbot; cf. The Greeks and Latines both call it [the lozenge] Rom-bus, which may be the cause, as I suppose, why they also gave that name to the fish commonly called the Turbot, who beareth lustily that figure.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 76.

2. In the United States, one of several large flounders more or less resembling the above, as Bothus maculatus, the sand-flounder or window-pane of the Atlantic coast, more fully called spotted turbot, and Hypopsetta guttulata, the diamond flounder of California.—3. The file-fish. [Bermudas.]—4. The trigger-fish.—Bastard turbot. See bastard.

turbulence (tér'bü-lens), n. [F. turbulence = Sp. Pg. turbulencia = It. turbolenza, turbulenzia, < LL. turbulentia, trouble, disquiet, < L. turbulentus, turbulent; see turbulent.] The state or character of being turbulent; a disturbed state; tumultuousness; agitation; disorder; commotion; refractoriness; insubordination.

They were necessitated by the turbulence and danger of those times to put the Kingdom by their own's authority into a posture of defence. Milton, Eikonoklastes, viii.

=Syn. Tumult, riot, sedition, mutiny, insurrection.

turbulency (tér'bü-len-si), n. [As turbulence (see -cy).] Turbulence. Milton, P. R., iv. 462.

turbulent (tér'bü-lent), a. [F. turbulent = Pr. turbulent, turbolent = Sp. Pg. turbulento = It. turbolento, turbulento, < L. turbulentus, restless, stormy, < turbare, trouble, agitate; see turbid.] 1. Disturbed; agitated; tumultuous; being in violent commotion: as, the turbulent ocean.

"It has been a turbulent and stormy night.

Shak., Pericles, iii. 2. 4.

2. Restless; unquiet; refractory; disposed to insubordination and disorder; hence, violent; tumultuous; riotous; disorderly.

It were happy for Government if these turbulent spirits could be singled out from the rest in their first attempts. Stillingfleet, Sermons, I. vii.

3. Producing commotion or agitation; inducing turbulence.

A froward retention of custom is as turbulent a thing as an innovation. Bacon, Innovations (ed. 1887).

=Syn. 2 and 3. Obstreperous, uproarious, brawling; seditious, mutinous, revolutionary.

turbulently (tér'bü-lent-li), adv. In a turbulent manner; tumultuously; with violent agitation; with refractoriness.

Turcism (tér'sizm), n. [ML. Turcus, Turk (see Turk), + -ism.] The religion, manners, character, or customs of the Turks.

Preferring Turcism to Christianity. Bp. Atterbury.

Türk's column. See columns of Türck, under column.

Turco (tür'kō), n. [F., < turco (or It. Turco), Turk; see Turk.] One of a body of light infantry raised among the natives of Algeria for service in the French army, and properly called Algerian tirailleurs. Also Turko.

turco² (tér'kō), n. A small Chilean bird, Hy-lactes megapodius.

turcois, n. Same as turquoise.

Turcoman, n. See Turkoman.

Turcophile (tér'kü-fil), n. [ML. Turcus, Turk, + Gr. φίλειν, love.] One who favors the Ottoman Turks, or their principles or policy. The Times (London), June 16, 1876.

Turcophilism (tér'kü-fil-izm), n. [ML. Turcophile + -ism.] The course or principles of a Turcophile. Athenæum, Feb. 10, 1887.

Turcophobist (tér'kü-fō-bist), n. [ML. Turcus, Turk, + Gr. φοβέσθαι, fear.] One who earnestly opposes the Ottoman Turks or their policy. J. Baker, Turkey, p. iv.

turcopolier (tér'kü-pō-ler), n. [OF. (AF.) turcopolier, also turcopier, tricipolier, turcupler, also turcopole, turcopie, commander of light cavalry called turcopolos, turcopolos, < ML. turcopoli, < MGr. τυρκόπουλος, light-armed soldiers, so called < Τύρκος, Τούρκος, Turk, + πούλος, child (or πάλος, colt).] An officer of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem of the tongue of England.

The Turcopolier of the Knights Hospitallers was always an Englishman; he was the commander of the light infantry of the order.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 205.

turd (tèrd), n. [ME. tord, toord, < AS. tord = MD. tord, a lump of excrement. Hence dim. *treddle*², < ME. tyrdel, < AS. tyrdel, dim. of tord.] A ball or lump of excrement; dung. [Low.]

Turdidae (tér'di-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Turdus + -idæ.] A large and nearly cosmopolitan family of dextrostrual oscine passerine birds, named from the genus Turdus; the thrushes and thrush-like birds, sometimes called Merulidae. The Turdidae form the leading group of Turdidae, turdiform, or cichlomorphic birds, respecting neither the definition nor the subdivision of which any authors agreed.

The Sylviidae, which form an extensive group, are alternately included in and excluded from it; and the same is true of five or six other nominal families of less extent, as Saxicolidae, Cinclididae, Pycnonotidae, Mimidae, Troglodytidae, some of the Troglodytidae, etc. The most typical Turdidae are characterized by the combination of notched crypsiform bill, booted tarsi, ten primaries of which the first is short or spurious, and the spotted coloration of the young birds. Such Turdidae constitute a subfamily, Turdinae, to which the family name is sometimes restricted. True Turdidae abound in the Palearctic, Ethiopian, Nearctic, and Neotropical regions. Some of them are among the most familiar of birds, as the fieldfare and blackbird of Great Britain, and the robin and wood-thrush of the United States. See Turdus and thrush.

turdiform (tér'di-fôr-m), a. [NL. turdiformis, < L. turdus, a thrush, + forma, form.] Thrush-like; resembling or related to a thrush; belonging to the Turdiformes; turdoid; cichlomorphic.

Turdiiformes (tér-di-fôr-mêz), n. pl. [NL.: see turdiform.] The thrushes and thrush-like birds; the turdoid Passeres; the Cichlomorphæ.

Turdinæ (tér-di-né), n. pl. [NL., < Turdus + -inæ.] The leading subfamily of Turdidae, represented by the genus Turdus and its near allies, and equivalent to the family Turdidae in a restricted sense; the true thrushes, often called Merulinæ. See Turdidae, Turdus, and *thrush*¹.

turdine (tér'din), a. [ML. < Turdus + -inæ.] Thrush-like in a strict sense; of or belonging to the Turdinæ.

turdoid (tér'doid), a. [L. turdus, a thrush, + Gr. ειδός, form.] Thrush-like in a broad sense; turdiform or cichlomorphic: especially used in the phrase turdoid Passeres, applied by Wallace to such birds in distinction from sturnoid, tanageroid, and formicarioid Passeres.

Turdulus (tér'dū-lus), n. [NL. (Hodgson, 1844), dim. of Turdus, q. v.] A genus of Oriental ground-thrushes, containing such as the Indian T. wardi, now usually referred to Geocichla.

Turdus (tér'dus), n. [NL. (Linnæus, taken as of 1758), < L. turdus, a thrush, fieldfare; see *thrush*¹.] A genus of thrushes. It formerly included any of the Turdidae and various other birds supposed to be thrush-like; later it was variously restricted, and it is now usually confined to species like the European mistlethrush (T. viscivorus), song-thrush (T. musicus), fieldfare (T. pilaris), and redwing (T. iliacus). In these the sexes are similar, the throat is not streaked, and the general color is not black. (See cuts under fieldfare, mistle-thrush, and *thrush*¹.) In the narrowest sense, the genus is coincident with the family in geographical range, being represented in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America. The blackish or dark thrushes, such as the common black-bird or ouzel of Europe, T. merula, and the ring-ouzel, T. troglodytes, represent an extensive group, either kept in Turdus proper or separated under the name of Merula. (See cuts under ouzel and blackbird.) The common robin or migratory thrush of North America represents a group indifferently called Planesticus (as a subgenus of Turdus) or merged in Merula. (See cut under robin, 2.) The song-thrushes of North America represent a section of Turdus named Hylocichla, as the wood-thrush, T. (H.) mustelinus; the hermit-thrush, T. (H.) pallasi (see cut under hermit-thrush); the tawny or Wilson's thrush, or veery, T. (H.) fuscescens (see cut under veery); the olive-backed thrush, T. (H.) swainsoni; the gray-cheeked or Alice's thrush, T. (H.) aliceæ; all of which are common woodland songsters of the United States. The varied thrush, or Oregon robin (see cut under thrush), formerly T. naevius, represents a section Hesperocichla, or is taken out of the genus and called Geocichla naevia. See Turdidae and *thrush*¹.

Turdus Solitarius (tér'dus sol-i-tā-ri-us), [NL., 'solitary thrush': L. turdus, thrush; solitarius, solitary.] A constellation introduced by Le Monnier in 1776, on the tail of Hydra, and encroaching on the southern scale of Libra. It is no longer used.

tureen (tū-rén'), n. [A false form of terreen, more prop. terrine, < F. terrine, an earthen vessel: see terrine.] The spelling tureen seems to have arisen in cook-books. There is a story that Marshal Turenne once used his helmet as a soup-dish, and thus gave a name to the dish. This is a mere fiction.] A deep dish with a cover, for holding liquids at table; especially, such a vessel, holding a gallon or more, intended for soup.

turf¹ (tèrf), n.: pl. turfs (tèrfs), obsolete turves (tèrvz). [ME. turf, torf (pl. turves, torves), < AS. turf (dat. and pl. turf) = OFries. turf = MD. torf, turf, D. turf = MLG. LG. torf = OHG. zurba, zurf, G. dial. turbe (G. torf, < LG.) = Ice. torfa, f., torf, n. = Sw. torf = Dan. tørv (cf. F. tourbe, Sp. Pg. turba, It. torba, ML. turba, < Teut.), turf; cf. Skt. darbha, a kind of grass.] 1. The surface or sward of grass-land, consisting of earth or mold filled with the roots of grass and other small plants, so as to adhere and form a kind of mat: earth covered with grass.

The shepherd that complain'd of love,
Who saw sitting by me on the turf,
Shak., As you like it, iii. 4. 52.

2. A piece of such earth or mold dug or torn from the ground; a sod.

In a litel herber that I have,
That benched was on turves freshe ygrave,
I had men sholde me my couche make.

Chaucer, Good Women, I. 204.

Those that are first cut up are called Turfes, . . . and such as are taken downward are called Peates.

Norden, Surveyor's Dialogue (1608), in Harrison's Eng.

(land New Shak. Soc.), II. 133.

3. In Ireland, same as peat. See peat.

In this rude hotel, however, the landlord . . . offered a seat at the turf-fire. Thackeray, Irish Sketch-Book, ix.

form, is properly restricted to these and to their feral stock; and the distinctive ocell of the United States wild turkey becomes M. americana (after Bartram) or M. sylvestris (after Vieillot, with those who decline to recognize Bartram's names on the ground that his nomenclature was not systematically binomial). The distinctions, though not trenchant, are obvious. (1) The northern wild turkey inhabits or has inhabited the eastern half of the United States, north into Canada, where it still occurs, northwest to some parts of the Missouri region, and southwest to Texas; it has been for many years extirpated from New England, where it formerly abounded; it lingers in the Middle States, still occurs in the immediate vicinity of Washington, and is common in the South and West. The head and upper part of the neck are naked, bristly, and carunculate, with an erect fleshy process on the former and a dewlap on the latter; a long bunch of coarse hairy feathers hangs from the breast; the tarsi are naked, scutellate before and behind, and spurred in the cock; the tail is broad and rounded, of fourteen to eighteen feathers, capable of erection into a circular disk (indicating the relationship of the turkey to the peafowl, and so of the Melagris to the Phasianidae). The plumage is compact and lustrous, and that of the body is almost entirely of blackish bronzed tints, not markedly whitening on the rump, upper tail-coverts, and ends of the tail-feathers. The cock or gobbler is 3 feet or more in total length, and may acquire a weight of 30 pounds, though the average is much less; the hen is considerably smaller and lighter. The wild turkey is confined to woodland. It continues abundant enough to retain economic importance, and its chase is a distinct branch of field sport; it is usually pursued with the shotgun, like other game-birds, or stalked with the rifle, like larger game; it may be decoyed by imitating its gobbling (see turkey-call), and where abundant may be trapped (see turkey-pen). The female nests on the ground, and lays a numerous clutch of eggs of a buff color profusely speckled with dark brown. The eggs have often been hatched under the domestic turkey, but the difficulty of immediately domesticating this feral stock is great. (2) The Mexican turkey, found wild in Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona, as well as southward, is mainly distinguished by the chestnut-brown upper tail-coverts with paler or whitish tips, and the similar light tips of the tail-feathers. This marking is usually distinctive, as when dark-colored individuals of the tame turkey are marketed unplucked for wild turkeys. Under domestication, now protracted for more than 300 years, this turkey has tended to enormous development of the caruncles and dewlap, occasionally sports a topknot of feathers, and runs into several color-strains which may be perpetuated by methodical selection. One of these, known in England as the Norfolk, tends to melanism, being chiefly of a lustrous blackish color; but the usual variation is in the opposite direction, resulting in the variegated plumage of the breed known in England as the Cambridgeshire, and in the buff, the pied, and even the white color-strain. (See also bronze turkey, under bronze.)

Hares, Partridges, Turkies, or Egges, fat or leane, young or old, they devour all they can catch in their power.
Capt. John Smith, Works, I. 134.

The turkey (in New England) is a long Fowl, of a black colour, yet is his flesh white; he is much bigger than our English Turkey; he hath long Leggs wherewith he can run as fast as a Dog, and can fly as fast as a Goose.

S. Clarke, Four Plantations in America (1678), p. 36.

(b) The second species of Melagris is M. ocellata, the ocellated turkey of Honduras and some other parts of Central America. This is much smaller and more beautiful than the other: the plumage is intensely lustrous, and in part varied with iridescent ocelli, recalling those of the peacock; the bare head is deep blue, studded with caruncles of an orange color, and no dewlap is developed.

2. With qualifying term, one of several different Australian birds which resemble or suggest the turkey. See phrases below.—Bronze turkey. See bronze.—Cambridgeshire turkey. See def. 1 (a) (2). [Eng.]—Colorado turkey. See Tantalus.—Crested turkey, a variety of the domestic turkey having a topknot of feathers. This has long been known; it was figured by Albin in 1738, and was the gallopavo cristatus of various authors.—Honduras turkey, the ocellated turkey.—Mexican turkey. See def. 1 (a).—Native turkey, the Australian bustard, Otis (Choriotis) australis. [Anglo-Australian.]—New England wild turkey, the feral turkey of the region named. This was early noted as differing from the domestic bird in its dark color and supposed greater size, and was the gallopavo sylvestris of various writers, as Ray, 1713. Its size was usually exaggerated, even up to a weight of 60 pounds (Brisson, 1760). See def. 1 (a) (1), and quotation from Clarke.—Norfolk turkey. See def. 1 (a) (2). [Eng.]—Ocellated turkey. turkey-blossom (tér'ki-blos'um), n. See Tribulus.

turkey-buzzard (tér'ki-buz'ård), n. An American vulture of the family Cathartidae, the Cathartes aura, common and wide-spread through the greater part of North and South America: generally so called in the United States in distinction from the black vulture, or carrion-crow, of that country, Catharista atrata: more fully called red-headed turkey-buzzard. This well-known and very useful bird is abundant in most of the States, extends northward to Canada, and in the Southern States is an efficient scavenger. It is from 27 to 30 inches long, and about 60 inches in extent, of a blackish-brown color, blacker on the wings and tail, and grayer on the wing-coverts; the whole head is bare of feathers, and of a reddish color ranging from livid crimson to pale carmine in the adults; the beak is white; the feet are flesh-colored, and the eyes brown. The naked skin of the head is wrinkled and sparsely bristled; the feathers begin in a circle around the upper part of the neck, and do not run up in a point on the hindhead as in the black vulture. Though ill-favored and bad-smelling when in hand, on the wing the turkey-buzzard is one of the most graceful of birds, soaring and sailing with a strong and buoyant flight on motionless pinions, and affording one of the best examples of this kind of flight. It nests on the ground or near it in hollow stumps and logs, and lays usually two eggs, white or creamy, boldly spotted and blotched with shades of rich brown and neutral tints. The young hatch clothed with whitish down. This vulture has the trick of "playing possum" when captured. The question whether it finds its food by scent or sight, or both, is still discussed. See cut under Cathartes.

turkey-call (tér'ki-kål), n. An instrument producing a sound which resembles the cry of the female turkey, used as a decoy.

Turkey carpet. See carpet.

turkey-cock (tér'ki-kok), n. [Orig. Turkey-cock or Turkey cock (Turkie-cock, etc.), < Turkey, the country so called (see turkey), + cock.] The bird now called turkey (including the female); properly, the male of the turkey, called the gobbler; hence, a person of great personal vanity and foolish pride: so called in allusion to the strutting of the bird.

Puppet-like thou dost advance thy crest,
And swell in big looks like some turkie-cock, Ready to burst with pride.

turkey-hen (tér'ki-hen), n. [Orig. Turkey-hen or Turkey hen: see turkey-cock and turkey.] The hen or female of the turkey.

Turkey-hone (tér'ki-hôn), n. Same as Turkey-stone, 2.

turkey-leather (tér'ki-leth'èr), n. A leather prepared by oil-tawing without first removing the hair side, the flesh side being blackened in the usual way: used for women's boots and shoes.

turkey-louse (tér'ki-lous), n. Goniodes stylifer, a bird-louse or mallophagous insect of the family Phleboteridae, which infests the domestic turkey, having the sides of the abdomen fringed with long hairs.

Turkey myrrh. See myrrh.

Turkey oak. See oak.

turkey-pea (tur'ki-pè), n. 1. Same as squirrel-corn. Also wild-turkey pea.—2. The hoary pea, Tephrosia virginiana. See Tephrosia. [Southern U. S.]

turkey-pen (tér'ki-pen), n. A pen contrived for trapping turkeys in parts of the United States where they were abundant. It was simply constructed of rails forming four sides and a top, with a low entrance at one place to admit the birds, which were lured by sprinkling corn to some distance from the opening, as well as inside the inclosure. There was no special contrivance to prevent exit, as the efficiency of the trap depended on the fact that the turkeys, on finding themselves shut in, would carry their heads too high to notice the place through which they had crept to pick up the corn.

turkey-poult (tér'ki-pòlt), n. The pullet or young of the turkey.

Turkey red. 1. See red, 1.—2. The cotton cloth dyed of this color, formerly brought from the East, but now made in western Europe and in America.—Mock Turkey red. See barwood.—Turkey red oil. See red.

Turkey-slate (tér'ki-slät), n. Same as Turkey-stone, 2.

Turkey-stone (tér'ki-stön), n. [Formerly also turkey-stone; < Turkey (see turkey) + stone.] 1. A turquoise.

She shows me her ring of a Turkey-stone, set with little sparks of diamonds.
Pepys, Diary, Feb. 18, 1667-68.

2. A very fine-grained siliceous rock, commonly of a yellowish or bluish color. It is used with oil for sharpening small cutting-instruments. It is commonly called Turkey oil-stone, as it comes from the interior of Asia Minor. All the so-called hones and oil-stones are almost entirely made up of very fine particles of silica, and the quality of the article varies with the fineness and sharpness of the grain and the compactness of the stone. Some varieties of hone and oil-stone are highly valued for putting a fine edge on delicate cutting-instruments, and bring very high prices.

turkey-vulture (tér'ki-vul'tūr), n. The turkey-buzzard: more fully called red-headed turkey-vulture.

urrlough (tér'looh), n. [Ir. turloch, a dry lake, < túr, bare, dry, < loch, lake; see lough.] In Ireland, a temporary pond or lake in certain limestone districts.

Some [luggas] are abrupt deep holes, others open into shallow hollows; and when the water during floods rises to the latter, it overflows the adjoining lands, forming the urrloughs, which are usually lakes in winter and callows in summer.
Kinchane, Geol. of Ireland, p. 325.

urrlupin (tér'lū-pin), n. [OF., appar. a particular use, in contempt, of urrlupin, "a grub, pushrome, start-up, new-nothing man of no value" (Cotgrave, ed. 1611); origin unknown.] In eccles. hist., a name given to the members of the French sect of about the fourteenth century, which held views very similar to those of the Brethren of the Free Spirit.

The urrlupins were first known by the names Beghards, or Beghins, and brothers and sisters of the free spirit. The common people alone called them urrlupins, a name which seems obviously to be connected with the wolvish howlings which these people gave. Their subsequent name in their religious writings, in all probability, would name of the fraternity of poor men might have been the cause why the wandering rogues, called Bedlam beggars, assumed or obtained the title of urrlupins or Turlygoods, especially if their mode of asking alms was accompanied by the gesticulations of madmen.

Douce, III. of Shakespeare.

urm (tér'm), n. [L. turma, a troop; cf. turba, a troop, crowd; see turba, turbid.] A troop; a turma.

The rhizome of Curcuma longa, a plant of the ginger family, native and long cultivated in the East Indies. It has a central ovoid body and lateral elongated tubers, called respectively round and long turmeric, formerly supposed to come from different species. Turmeric is of a deep brownish or greenish yellow, inwardly orange, of a resinous consistence and peculiar aromatic odor. It is prepared for use by grinding. In India it is most largely employed as a condiment, particularly as an ingredient in curry powders. It has the property of an aromatic stimulant, and is there given internally for various troubles, and applied externally for skin-diseases. In western countries its chief use (now declining) has been that of a dyestuff, in which capacity it affords beautiful but fugitive shades of yellow; at present a leading use is in the preparation of a test-paper called turmeric-paper or curcuma-paper. The coloring matter is called curcumin; and the oil to which its aromatic taste and smell are due, turmeric-oil or turnerol. Sometimes called Indian saffron. The Hindu name is huldee.

2. The plant producing turmeric.—3. The bloodroot, Sanguinaria Canadensis.—African turmeric, the rootstock of a species of Canna, having properties like those of turmeric, cultivated in Sierra Leone, and much used by the natives for dyeing yellow.

Turnera (tur'nér-ā), n. [NL. (Plumier, 1703), named after W. Turner (about the middle of the 16th century), a physician, author (1551) of an English herbal.] A genus of polypetalous plants, type of the order Turneraceæ. It is characterized by usually perigynous stamens and by three or more multilobed stigmas. There are 51 species, natives of tropical America, with one naturalized in the Old World. They are herbs or shrubs with scattered leaves, which are often gland-bearing at the base. The flowers are yellow, and usually solitary in the axils, pedicel in the frequent union of the pedicel with the petiole, the flower therefore seeming to spring from the base of the leaf. Several species are cultivated under glass for their very handsome flowers, which often resemble those of Thaibergia. T. aphrodisiaca is used as an astringent in Brazil. T. umbellata, a species widely distributed from the West Indies to Brazil, and known as hally-rose and sau-rose, is a reputed tonic and expectorant. The stimulant drug damiana is largely prepared from T. micropetala, and from T. diffusa and its variety aphrodisiaca, especially from the latter, which is a native of Texas, Mexico, and Lower California. This, which is widely known by the name damiana, is also used, in the form of a hot tea, as a blood-purifier and as a beverage, and is sold in preparations with spirits as a tonic or diuretic, as well as for alleviating colic and nervous disorders. See cut in next column.

as for chair-backs, scrollwork, etc. Also called sweep-saw, bow-saw, frame-saw, scroll-saw.—2. A keyhole-saw.

turning-steel (tér'ning-stél), n. A smooth hardened and tempered piece of round bar-steel, either with or without a handle, used to turn the edge of a tool, or give it a slightly flanged form, by rubbing.

turning-tool (tér'ning-töl), n. A sharp steel tool used in turning and shaping the ends of other tools in seal-engraving, to suit each style of work.

turning-tree† (tér'ning-tré), n. The gallows.

And at the last she and her husband, as they deserved, were apprehended, arraigned, & hanged at the foresayd turning tree. Hall, Hen. VIII., p. 315.

turnip (tér'nip), n. [Formerly also turnep; perhaps orig. turn-nep*, < turn, implying something round, + nep, neep. < ME. nepe, < AS. næp, a turnip; see *neep*2.] The thick fleshy root of the plant designated by Linneus as Brassica Rapa, but now believed to be a variety, together with the rape (which see), of B. campestris, a plant found wild, in varieties corresponding to these plants, in Europe and Asiatic Russia (see nawew); also, the plant itself, a common garden and field crop. The rutabaga, or Swedish turnip, with smooth leaves, and root longer than broad, is referred with probability to the same source. The turnip proper has the root rounded, often broader than long, the root-leaves usually lobed, rough and hairy. The turnip was cultivated by the Greeks and Romans, and is now widely grown in temperate climates for use in soups and stews, or as a boiled vegetable, mashed or whole, and for feeding cattle and sheep, forming in Great Britain a valuable rotation crop. The young shoots of the second year, known as turnip-tops, are dressed for early greens. The turnip is little nutritious, containing from 90 to 92 per cent. of water. The rutabaga is somewhat more nutritious, but less easily grown. The varieties of both plants are numerous. The crop sometimes suffers from an affection called finger-and-toe or dactylorhiza, in which the root divides into branches, apparently a tendency to revert to the wild state. Various insects attack the turnip. See turnip-fly.—Devil's turnip, the common bryonia, Bryonia dioica.—Indian turnip. See Indian.—St. Anthony's turnip, Ranunculus bulbosus, its bulbs being a favorite food of pigs, and St. Anthony being the patron of pigs. Also called St. Anthony's rape.—Swedish turnip. See rutabaga.—Teltow turnip, a variety grown in Germany, with roots but 1 inch thick and 3 inches long, the root having a very pleasant flavor, whence it is much valued for soups and stews.—Turnip flea-beetle. See Phyllotreta and turnip-fly.—Turnip-stemmed cabbage, the kohlrabi.—Wild turnip. (a) The common turnip in its native state. See def. (b) Same as Indian turnip. [U. S.] (See also Hon's-turnip, prairie-turnip.)

turnip-aphid (tér'nip-af'id), n. The plant-louse Aphis rapæ, which affects the turnip. Also turnip-aphis.

turnip-cabbage (tér'nip-kab'āj), n. Same as kohlrabi.

turnip-cutter (tér'nip-kut'ér), n. In agri., a root-cutter.

turnip-flea (tér'nip-flé), n. Same as turnip-fly (c).

turnip-fly (tér'nip-flī), n. One of several different winged insects which are injurious to turnips. (a) A dipterous insect of the genus Anthomyia, as A. radicum, whose larva lives in the turnip-root. See cut under Anthomyia. (b) A hymenopter of the genus Athalia, as A. centifolia, whose larvæ, known as niggers, injure the leaves of the turnip. (c) A coleopter of the genus Helictes, as H. (Phyllotreta) nemorum; a turnip flea-beetle. [Eng.]

turnip-maggot (tér'nip-mag'ot), n. The larva of Anthomyia radicum. See turnip-fly (a).

turnip-parsnip (tér'nip-pärs'nip), n. See parsnip.

turnip-pest (tér'nip-pest), n. Any of the insects which are very injurious to the turnip, and most of which have distinctive names. See turnip-fly, and cut under Plutella.

turnip-puller (tér'nip-pul'ér), n. An agricultural implement used for pulling turnips from the ground. E. H. Knight.

turnip-pulper (tér'nip-pul'pér), n. A root-cutter or root-pulper.

turnip-radish (tér'nip-rad'ish), n. A turnip-shaped variety of the common radish.

turnip-rooted (tér'nip-rö'ted), a. Having a short, thick, rounded root like a turnip.—Turnip-rooted celery. Same as celeriac.—Turnip-rooted parsnip, the turnip-parsnip.

turnip-shaped (tér'nip-shäpt), a. Shaped like a turnip; napiform.

turnip-shell (tér'nip-shel), n. A shell of the family Turbinellidae, and especially of the genus Rapa. See cut under Turbinella.

turnip-tailed (tér'nip-täld), a. Having a turnip-shaped or napiform tail, swollen at the base and suddenly tapering; noting a gecko.

turnipwood (tér'nip-wüd), n. The Australian rosewood, Synowm glandulosum. The wood when fresh is of a deep-red color and rose-scented. It is used for cabinet purposes, also for lining in houses and in ship-building. This name is from the smell of the bark, which resembles that of a Swedish turnip.

turnip (tér'nip-i), a. [< turnip + -y1.] Turnip-like. Encyc. Brit., I. 175. [Rare.]

Turnix (tér'niks), n. [NL. (Bonnaterre, 1790), said to be clipped from Coturnix, q. v.] A genus of hemipods or button-quails, giving name to the family Turnicidae: same as Hemipodius, and of prior date.

turnkey (tér'n'ké), n. [< turn, v., + obj. key1.] 1. The person who has charge of the keys of a prison, for opening and fastening the doors; a prison warden.—

2. An instrument, now almost obsolete, used for extracting teeth.

turnout (tér'n'out), n. [< turn out: see under turn.] 1. The act of turning out or coming forth.

The bugles were sounding the turn-out. Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xxx.

Specifically—2. A quitting of employment, especially with a view to obtain increase of wages or some other advantage; a strike.

All his business plans had received a check, a sudden pull-up, from this approaching turn-out. Mrs. Gaskell, North and South, xviii.

3. One who has turned out for such a purpose; a striker.

Those were no true friends who helped to prolong the struggle by assisting the turn-outs. And this Boucher-man was a turn-out, was he not? Mrs. Gaskell, North and South, xx.

4. A short side-track in a railway designed to enable one train to pass another.—5. People or things that have turned out; persons who have come out to see a spectacle, witness a performance at the theater, attend a public meeting, or the like.—6. A carriage or coach with the horses; also, carriages or equipages collectively.

The annual procession of his majesty's mails on the king's birthday was a sight equal, in the smartness of the whole equipment, to the best turnout of the Coaching or Four-in-hand clubs of our day. S. Dowell, Taxes in England, III. 50.

7. The net quantity of produce yielded; production.

If a large turn-out is necessary, carbonization may be effected in twelve or thirteen hours, but a slower process, say sixteen hours, gives better results. Spons' Encyc. Manuf., I. 10.

turnover (tér'n'ô'vér), n. and a. [< turn over: see under turn.] I. n. 1. The act or result of turning over: as, a turnover in a carriage.—2. A kind of pie or tart in a semicircular form: so called because made by turning over one half of a circular crust upon the other.

Other children surveyed the group, and with envious eyes and watering mouths beheld the demolition of tarts and turnovers. Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 109.

3. An apprentice whose indentures have been transferred or turned over to a new employer. Also called turnover apprentice. [Eng.]

That no Turn-overs be received by any Master Printer but from a Master Printer; and that no Master Printer turning over any Apprentice to another Master Printer may be permitted to take any other Apprentice in his place till the full time of the said Apprentice so turned over be expired. Case and Proposals of the Free Journeymen Printers, quoted [in English Guilds (E. L. T. S.), Int., p. cxi., note.

4. A piece of white linen formerly worn by cavalry over their stocks.—5. The amount of money turned over or drawn in a business, as in a retail shop, in a specified time.

The Simbirsk fair, having a turnover of some 6 million roubles, still maintains its importance. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 77.

6. A kitchen utensil: same as slice, 3 (h).

II. a. Turned over or down; capable of being turned over or down.—Turnover apprentice. See I. 3.—Turnover table. (a) A table the top of which is fitted with a movable panel which can be taken out and reversed. Such tables have sometimes a chess-board on one side of the movable panel, and cloth on the other for card-playing. (b) A turn-up table—that is, a table whose top can be moved into a vertical position.

turnpike (tér'n'pik), n. [< turn + pike1.] 1. A frame of pikes or pointed bars, a kind of revolving cheval-de-frise, set in a narrow passage to obstruct the progress of an enemy.

Love storms his lips, and takes the fortress in, For all the bristled turn-pikes of his chin. P. Beaumont, Antiplaton.

2. A turnstile.

I move upon my axle like a turnpike. B. Jonson, Staple of News, iii. 1.

3. A gate set across a road, in order to stop carriages, wagons, etc., and sometimes foot-travelers, till toll is paid; a toll-bar; a toll-gate.

She married afterwards, . . . and now keeps with her old husband a turnpike, through which I often ride. Thackeray, Fitz-Boodles's Confessions.

4. A turnpike road.

The road is by this means so continually torn that it is one of the worst turnpikes round about London. DeFoe, Tour through Great Britain, II. 178. (Davies.)

5. A turnpike-stair. [Scotch.]—Turnpike road, a road on which turnpikes or toll-gates are established by law, and which are made and kept in repair by the toll collected from carriages, wagons, cattle, etc., which travel on them, or by the income derived from farming such toll.—Turnpike sailor, a beggar who goes about dressed as a sailor. [Thieves' cant.]

I became a turnpike sailor, as it's called, and went out as one of the Shallow Brigade, wearing a Guernsey shirt and drawers, or tattered trowsers. Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 415.

etc., but to admit that of persons, or to bar a passage until toll or passage-money is collected; they are also used (sometimes with a turnstile-register) at the entrance of buildings, as where there is a charge for admission, or where it is desired to prevent the entrance of too many persons at one time.

Turnstile-register (térn'stíl-rej'is-tér), n. A recording device for registering the number of persons passing through a turnstile, as at the entrance of a toll-bridge, a place of amusement, etc. It works by means of gear-wheels. Turnstone (térn'stón), n. [< turn, v., + obj. one.] A small gallatorial bird of the genus Repsilas, allied both to plovers and to sand-pipers: so called from its habit of turning over flat stones or pebbles on the sea-shore in search of food. The common turnstone or sea-dottrel is S. interpres. In full summer plumage this is one of the handsomest of its tribe, being pied with black, brown, white, and chestnut-red, and having orange feet; it is 8 to 9 inches long, and about 17 in extent of wings. It is nearly cosmopolitan in its extensive migrations, and breeds in high latitudes. It is common in North America, especially in the Pacific, and there has many local names, as brant-bird, sea-bird, whale-bird, heart-bird, chicken-bird, calico-bird, black-back, calico-jacket, checkered snipe, sparkled-back, rudd-back, red-legs, red-legged plover, bishop-plover, nygnot-snipe, horse-foot snipe, chuckatuck, creddock, jenny, etc., derived from its appearance or habits. Among its Turnstone (Streptopelia interpres), in full summer plumage.

English names are Hebridian sandpiper and variegated plover, stone-pecker, tangle-picker, etc. The black-headed turnstone, S. melanocephalus, is a different variety or species, mostly of a blackish color, found on the coasts of the North Pacific. See Streptopelia.—Plover-billed turnstone. Same as surf-bird. See Seabird.

Turn-table (térn'tá'bl), n. 1. A circular platform designed to turn upon its center, and supported by a series of wheels that travel upon a circular track laid under the edge of the platform. This is the original form of the railroad turntable, and is still in use. The platform is laid with a single line of rails, and the running-gear, pivot, wheels, etc.,

Turn-table.

a side elevation of turn-table, pivoted at the central pier A; b, a plan view of the support ends and upon which the latter turn around; c, c', fixed rails and turn-table rails; d, d', flat-topped rails; e, e', fixed rails and turn-table rails. 2. A device used in tracing the circular cement-cells for microscope-slides. E. H. Knight.

turntale (térn'täl), n. [< turn, v., + tale¹.] An apostrophe. See the quotation under turnway. turn-tippet (térn'típ'et), n. [< turn, v., + tippet¹.] A turncoat; a time-server.

The priests, for the most part, were double-faced, turn-tippets, and flatterers. Cramer, Works (Parker Soc.), II. 15. (Davies.)

turn-under (térn'un'dér), n. Same as fall-under.

turn-up (térn'up), n. [< turn up: see under turn.] 1. A disturbance; a commotion; a shindy or scrimmage.

I have seen many a turn-up, and some pitched battles among the yokels; and, though one or two were rather too sanguinary for my taste, no serious mischief was done. Notes Ambrosiane, Dec., 1834.

2. One who or that which turns up unexpectedly or without prearrangement.

The type of men of which Emerson and Carlyle are the most pronounced and influential examples in our time, it must be owned, are comparatively a new turn-up in literature. The Century, XXVII. 926.

[Colloq. or slang in both uses.]

turnus (tér'nus), n. [< NL. turnus, the specific name, < L. Turnus, a man's name.] The tiger-swallowtail, Papilio turnus, a large yellow Turnus (Papilio turnus), one half natural size.

black-striped swallow-tailed butterfly common in the United States. One striking variety of the female has the wings entirely black. The larva, of a deep velvety-green color, feeds on sassafras, alder, willow, oak, apple, and various other trees.

turnway (térn'wá), n. [< turn, v., + way¹, n.] An apostrophe. [Rare.]

Many times, when we have runne a long race in our tale spoken to the hearers, we do sodainly flye out & either speake or exclaime at some other person or thing, and therefore the Greekes call such a figure (as we do) the turnway or turntale. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 109.

turn-wrest (térn'rest), a. Noting a plow having a reversible mold-board, whereby a furrow may be turned either to the right or to the left, according to the position of the mold-board.

Turonian (túr-ó-ni-an), n. [Irreg. < Touraine in France, where the system is well developed, + -ian.] In geol., a division of the Cretaceous system, according to the continental geologists. It lies between the Cenomanian and the Senonian, and is the equivalent of the English Lower Chalk, or "Chalk without flints"—the chalk of the cliffs of Dover and Shakespeare Cliff. In the more detailed nomenclature of the French geologists it includes the Santonian and Campanian.

turpentine (tér'pén-tín), n. [Formerly also terpentine; < ME. turpentine = MD. terpentijn, termentijn, D. terpentijn = G. Sw. Dan. terpentijn, < OF. turbentine, terebentine, turpentine, terebenthine, ML. terebintina, NL. terebintina, turpentine, < L. terebintina (sc. resina), fem. of terebintinus, of the terebinth, < terebinthus, < Gr. terebinthos, terebinth: see terebinth, and cf. terebintine.] 1. An oleoresinous substance secreted by the wood or bark of a number of trees, all coniferous except the terebinth, which yields Chian turpentine. It consists chiefly of an essential hydrocarbon oil (C₁₀H₁₆) and a resin called colophony or rosin. The common turpentine is derived in France from the maritime pine, Pinus maritima (French or Bordeaux turpentine); in Russia and Germany, from the Scotch pine, P. sylvestris; in Austria and Corsica, from the Corsican pine, P. laricina; in the East Indies and Japan, from several pines; and in the United States, most largely in North Carolina, from the southern or long-leaved pine, P. palustris, and somewhat from the loblolly-pine, P. taeda. For other turpentines, see the phrases below. In the United States turpentine is obtained by cutting a pocket in the side of the tree (boxing), whence it is periodically collected. In France the less destructive method is practised of removing a piece of bark and conducting the flow into earthen vessels. The crude turpentine is subjected to distillation, separating the oil, or so-called spirit or spirits of turpentine, from the rosin—the oil in the case of the long-leaved pine constituting it is said, 17 per cent., and in the case of the maritime pine 24 per cent. This when pure is limpid and colorless, of a penetrating peculiar odor, and a pungent bitterish taste. Spirit of turpentine is very extensively used in mixing paints and varnishes. In medicine it is stimulant and diuretic, an anthelmintic, and externally a rubefacient and counter-irritant.

Men sellen a Gome, that Men clepen Turbentine, in stede of Bawme; and they putten there to a liddle Bawme for to geven gode Oodour. Mandeville, Travels, p. 51.

2. The oil or spirit of turpentine; turps: an ordinary but less precise use.—Alleppo turpentine, an article resembling, but not equal to, the Bordeaux turpentine, obtained in Provence from Pinus Halepensis.—Canada turpentine, Canada balsam. (See balsam.) During the American civil war, turpentine of the common sort was obtained from the Canadian red pine, Pinus resinosus.—Carpathian turpentine, usually called Carpathian balsam, a turpentine from the Swiss stone-pine, Pinus Cembra.—Chian turpentine, the product of the turpentine-tree (which see), obtained by incision. It is of a feebly aromatic and terebinthinous flavor, not bitter or acrid, and of a characteristic pleasantly aromatic and terebinthinous scent. It was formerly of medicinal repute, then fell nearly into disuse, but latterly has been used with some success for cancer. Also Cyprian or Scio turpentine.—Hungarian turpentine, the product of the dwarf pine, Pinus Pungitio, usually called Hungarian balsam, an article scarcely met with in commerce. Its essential oil is used as an inhalant in throat-diseases.—Larch turpentine. Same as Venetian turpentine.—Mineral turpentine, a deodorized benzoin used in painting as a substitute for turpentine.—Scio turpentine. Same as Chian turpentine.—Strasburg turpentine, the product of the silver fir, Abies alba, much resembling common turpentine, but pleasantly odorous, and not acrid and bitter. It was formerly much esteemed in medicine, but is now nearly obsolete.—Turpentine camphor. Same as artificial camphor. See camphor.—Turpentine ointment. See ointment.—Venetian or Venice turpentine, the oleoresin of the European larch, Larix Europæa, secreted chiefly in its sapwood. It is less siccative than any other kind. It is useful for plasters, and is often prescribed in veterinary practice; but the genuine article is consumed mostly in continental Europe.

turpentine (tér'pén-tín), v. t. [< turpentine, n.] To apply turpentine to; rub with turpentine.

Or Martyr beat like Shrovetide cocks with bats, And fired like turpentine poor wasting rats. Wolcott (P. Pindar), Subjects for Painters.

turpentine-hack (tér'pén-tín-hak), n. A hand-tool for cutting or boxing pine-trees, to start the flow of crude turpentine. E. H. Knight.

turpentine-moth (tér'pén-tín-móth), n. Any one of several tortricid moths whose larvæ bore the twigs and shoots of pine and fir, causing an exudation of resin and killing the twig. Resiniana resinana is the common turpentine-moth of Europe; R. costockiana and R. frustana are common in the United States.

turpentine-oil (tér'pén-tín-oil), n. The oil of turpentine. See turpentine. Also called pine-oil.—Hydrochlorate of turpentine-oil, artificial camphor. See camphor.

turpentine-still (tér'pén-tín-stil), n. An apparatus for distilling spirit from turpentine, or turpentine from pine-wood.

turpentine-tree (tér'pén-tín-tré), n. 1. The terebinth-tree, Pistacia Terebinthus, the source of Chian or Scio turpentine. Though the range of the terebinth is wide, the moderate demand is met by about 1,000 trees, some of them 800 or 900 years old, on the Isle of Scio. See terebinth.

2. The Australian Syncarpia laurifolia (Tristania albens) and Tristania conferta, trees affording an aromatic oil. See the generic names.

turpentinic (tér'pén-tín'ik), a. [< turpentine + -ic.] Related to turpentine.—Turpentinic acid. Same as terebic acid (which see, under terebic).

turpeth (tér'peth), n. [Formerly also turbeth, turbith, turbist; < ME. turbyte, < OF. (and F.) turbith = Pg. turbit (ML. turpethum), < Ar. turbid, < Pers. turbid, a cathartic, turbad, a purgative root.] 1. The root of Ipomea (Convolvulus) Turpethum, a plant of Ceylon, Malabar, and Australia, which has a cathartic property. (See Indian jalap, under jalap.) It is sometimes called vegetable turpeth, to distinguish it from mineral turpeth.—2. Turpeth-mineral.—Resin of turpeth. See resin.

turpeth-mineral (tér'peth-min'e-ral), n. A name formerly given to the yellow basic mercury sulphate (HgSO₄·2HgO). It acts as a powerful emetic, and was formerly given in croup, but it is now seldom used internally. It is a very useful erubine in cases of headache, amaurosis, etc.

turpify (tér'pi-fi), v. t. [*< L. turpificare, in pp. turpificatus, made foul, < turpis, foul, base, + -ficare, < facere, make.] To calumniate; stigmatize.

O [that] . . . a woman . . . should thus turpify the reputation of my doctrine with the superscription of a fool! Sir P. Sidney, Wansstead Play, p. 620. (Davies.)

turpint, n. An obsolete corruption of terrapin.

Turpinia (tér-pin'-i-ä), n. [NL. (Ventenat, 1803), named after P. J. F. Turpin, a French naturalist and artist (1775-1840).] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Staphyleaceae. It is characterized by a three-lobed ovary indehiscent in fruit. The 8 species are natives of Asia and America, especially in China, India, and the West Indies. They are smooth trees or shrubs with terete branchlets bearing opposite leaves, usually composed of opposite serrulate leaflets. The small white flowers form terminal and axillary spreading panicles. Some species produce an edible drupeous fruit. T. occidentalis, a tree from 20 to 30 feet high, is known as cassara-wood or coronantes drumwood in Jamaica. (See drumwood.) T. pomifera of India and China, the toukshama of Burma, a very variable species from 12 to 40 feet high, in its typical state bears a fleshy, smooth, and roundish yellow, green, or reddish drupe, sometimes 2 inches in diameter.

turpis causa (tér'pis ká'zä). [L.: turpis, base, vile; causa, cause, reason: see cause.] In Scots law, a base or vile consideration on which no action can be founded. This would be called in English law a consideration contra bonos mores, or against public policy.

turpitude (tér'pi-tüd), n. [F. turpitude = It. turpitudine, < L. turpido, baseness, < turpis, base.] Inherent baseness or vileness; shameful wickedness; depravity.

All manner of conceits that stirre vp any vehement passion in a man doo it by some turpitude or euill and vndecey that is in them.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 242.

How wouldst thou have paid
My better service, when my turpitude
Thou thus dost crown with gold!

Shak., A. and C., iv. 6. 33.

Whose political vices, at least, were imputable to mental incapacity, and to evil counsellors, rather than to any natural turpitude of heart. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., l. 3.

turps (térps), n. A workmen's name for the oil or spirit of turpentine.

The spirit of turpentine will be designated by the word turps, which is in general use, has only one meaning, and has the advantage of brevity.

Spons. Encyc. Manuf., p. 2025.

turquet, n. [Appar. < OF. Turquet*, dim. of Turc, Turk: see Turk.] A figure of a Turk or Mohammedan.

Let anti-masques not be long; they have been commonly of fools, satyrs, baboons, wild men, antics, . . . turquets, nymphs, rustics, Cupids, statues moving, and the like. Bacon, Masques and Triumphs (ed. 1887).

turquoise (tér-koiz' or tér-kéz'), n. [A word of unstable form and pronunciation, the older forms being now largely displaced by turquoise after mod. E., the pron. wavering between that belonging properly to the word (tér'kis), and that belonging only to the later form turquoise, namely tér-koiz': other pronunciations are tér-kéz', tér-kés'. Now most commonly spelled turquoise, also turkoise, also turquois, turkois, turcois, also turkis (as in Tennyson); early mod. E. turquoise, turquois, turkoise, turquoise, also turqueis, rarely turcas; not found in ME. (but prob. existent); = D. turkeois, turcoys, now turkoois = MHG. türkis, türkoys, turgis, G. türkiss, türkis, now türkiss = Dan. türkis, türkis = Sw. turkos; < OF. turquoise, tourques, F. turquoise = Sp. turquesa = Pg. turquesa = It. turchese (ML. reflex turchesius), a turquoise, lit. 'Turkish stone' (being brought through Turkey ult. from Persia, or 'Turkish' meaning practically 'Asiatic') (cf. Turkey-stone); fem. of OF. Turquois, etc. (ML. Turcensis*, Turkish (see Turkis), < Turc, Turk: see Turk.) An opaque blue or greenish-blue precious stone, consisting essentially of a phosphate of aluminium containing a little copper and iron. The true or Oriental turquoise, a favorite ornamental stone in rings and other articles of jewelry, is found in a mountain region in Persia, and was originally brought into western Europe by way of Turkey. A variety found in New Mexico, usually of a greenish-blue color, is also used in jewelry. The principal locality is in the Los Cerillos Mountains, where the turquoise was mined by the Indians in very early times. A greenish turquoise is also found in Nevada. See bone-turquoise.

Turkis and agate and almandine.

Tennyson, The Merchant.

Reconstructed turquoise, imitation turquoise made of finely powdered ivory which is deposited in a solution of copper. This deposit is dried, baked very slowly, and cut. Rock-turquoise, a name given to a matrix of turquoise when small grains of turquoise are embedded in it. In commerce turquoises are said to come from the old and the new rock—the specimens from the old rock being true turquoise, and those from the new being odontolite, a fossil ivory stained with copper.

turquoise-green (tér-koiz'grén), n. A somewhat pale color intermediate between green and blue.

turr (tér), n. [Burmese.] A three-stringed viol used in Burma.

turrel (tur'el), n. [Prob. ult. < OF. tour, a turn: see tour, turn, and cf. turret.] An auger used by coopers.

turret¹ (tur'et), n. [ME. turret, toret, < OF. tourette, touret, a turret or small tower: see tower. The W. tured, tower, is from the E.] 1. A little tower rising from or otherwise con-needed with a larger building; a small tower, often crowning or finishing the angle of a wall, etc. Turrets are of two chief classes—such as rise immediately from the ground, as staircase turrets, and such as are formed on the upper parts of a building, often corbeled out from the wall and not extending down to the ground, as bartizan turrets. See also cuts under peel and bartizan.

2. In medieval warfare, a movable building of a square form, consisting of ten or even twenty stories, and sometimes 180 feet high, usually moved on wheels, and employed in approaches to a fortified place for carrying soldiers, engines, ladders, etc.—3. Milit., a tower, often revolving, for offensive purposes, on land or water. See cut under monitor.—4. In her.: (a) A small slender tower, usually forming part of a bearing, being set upon a larger tower. See turreted, 3. (b) A bearing representing a kind of scepter having both ends alike and resembling the ends of the cross avallane. See turret. [Rare.]—5. In a railroad-car of American model, the raised part of the middle of the roof, utilized for affording light and ventilation.—6. In a lathe, a cylindrical or polygonal block on the bed, with holes around it for dies.

turret² (tur'et), n. [Prob. < OF. touret*, equiv. to tournet, a ring in the mouth of a bit, < tour, a turn: see turn.] Same as terret.

The silver turrets of his harness.

De Quincey, Eng. Mail Coach.

turreted (tur'et-ed), a. [ME. turret + -ed.] 1. Furnished with turrets.—2. In her., having small towers or turrets set upon it, as a castle or a city wall.—3. Formed like a tower: as, a turreted lamp.—4. In conch., having a long or towering spire; turrellated. Also turreted. See also cut under Turritellidæ.

turret-gun (tur'et-gun), n. A gun especially designed for use in a revolving turret.

turret-head (tur'et-hed), n. The revolving head of a bolt-cutter. E. H. Knight.

turret-lathe (tur'et-lāth), n. A screw-cutting lathe the slide of which is fitted with a cylindrical or polygonal block or turret pierced around its periphery with openings to receive dies, which are secured in place by set-screws. E. H. Knight.

turret-ship (tur'et-ship), n. An armor-plated ship of war with low sides, and having on the deck heavy guns mounted within one or more cylindrical iron turrets, which are made to rotate, so that the guns may be brought to bear in any required direction. See monitor, 7.

turribant (tur'i-bant), n. Same as turban. turricula (tu-rik'ū-lā), n.; pl. turriculæ (-lā). [ML., < L. turricula, a little tower, dim. of turris, tower: see turret, tower.] Any utensil, as a candlestick, having the form of a tower, especially in ornamental art.

turriculate (tu-rik'ū-lāt), a. [L. turricula, a little tower (see turricula), + -atē.] 1. Having turrets; characterized by the presence of a number of small towers; turreted.—2. In conch., turreted. Also turriculated.

turriculated (tu-rik'ū-lā-ted), a. [ME. turriculate + -ed.] Same as turriculate, 2.

turritile (tur'i-lit), n. [ME. Turritiles.] A fossil ammonitoid cephalopod, the shells of which occur in the cretaceous and greensand formations, and which belongs to the genus Turritiles or a related form. The shell is spiral, turreted, and sinistral. There are about 37 species.

Turritiles (tur-i-litēz), n. [NL. (Lamarck, 1801), < L. turris, a tower, + Gr. λίθος, stone.] A genus of fossil cephalopods, generally referred to the family Stephanoceratidae, but by some considered as the type of a family Turritillidae; the turritiles, as T. costatus or T. catenatus.

turrition, n. [It. torrione.] A tower or bastion of a fortified city or post.

turreted, a. [L. turritus, towered (< turris, tower: see tower), + -ed.] See turreted, 4.

Turritella (tur-i-tel'ä), n. [NL. (Lamarck, 1799), < L. turritus, towered, + -ella.] 1. The typical genus of Turritellidae, having a long turriculate spirally striate shell, with rounded aperture, as T. imbricata.—2. [l. c.] Any member of this genus.

Turritellidæ (tur-i-tel'i-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Turritella + -idæ.] A family of tænioglossate holostomous gastropods, whose typical genus is Turritella; the screws or screw-shells.

turritelloid (tur-i-tel'oid), a. [ME. turritellus, < oid.] Resembling a screw-shell; of or pertaining to the Turritellidæ. P. P. Carpenter.

tursio (tér'si-ō), n. [NL., < L. tursio, a kind of fish resembling the dolphin.] 1. A kind of dolphin, Delphinus tursio, of British and other North Atlantic waters, of rather large size and heavy build, with comparatively large and few teeth.—2. [cap.] Same as Tursiops.

Tursiops (tér'si-ops), n. [NL., < Tursio (see tursio) + Gr. ωψ, aspect.] A genus of Delphinidae named from the resemblance of its members to the tursio, and including such species as T. gilli of the North Pacific, which shares with various cetaceans the name cowfish. Also formerly Tursio (a name preoccupied in another connection).

turtle¹ (tér'tl), n. [ME. turtile, tortile, turtel, turtul, also tortor (also turtre, < OF.), < AS. turtile = G. turtel (taube) = OF. turtre, F. tortue (also dim. tourtierre, tourterelle) = Pr. tortre = Sp. tórtora, tórtola = It. tortora, tortola, < L. turtur, a turtle; a duplicated form, prob. imitative of the cooing of a dove.] A turtle-dove.

The wedded turtle with her herte trewe.

Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 358.

Greenland turtle, the sea-pigeon, or Greenland sea-dove Uria grylle. See cut under guillemot.

turtle² (tér'tl), n. [Formerly also tortle; prob. a corruption of tortoise, or an accom. form, first used by English sailors, of the Sp. tortuga or Pg. tartaruga, a tortoise: see tortoise. In either case the alteration appears to have been assisted

The detachable segment of the cylinder of rotary printing-machine which contains the types or plates to be printed: so called from its curved surface. In practice, the turtle is removed from the machine to the type-setting room. The types are made up on the curved surface, and firmly held in place by rebated column-rules, thicker at the top than at the bottom, and firmly grooved in the turtle. When the types have been locked up by screws on the turtle, they are placed on the machine for printing without risk of being out, or they can be molded in thin curved form for the paper-maché process, and the curved plate made of metal can be used in printing. The stereotype method is preferred.—Bastard turtle, Thalassochelys kemani.—Box-turtle, see box-tortoise, Cistudo, cooler, Pycnis.—Chicken-turtle, same as chicken-tortoise. [Southern S.]—Diamond-backed turtle, see diamond-backed.—Green turtle, a tortoise of the genus Podocnemis, as carolinensis.—Green turtle, one of several species of turtles, belonging to the natural order Chelonina, family Cheloniidae, and genus Chelonia (which see for the technical characters). They are all marine, and feed almost exclusively on algae or seaweeds. The common species the West Indies is Chelonia mydas; that of Pacific waters C. agassizii. The former comes on the coast of the United States from the Gulf of Mexico northward, occasionally to Long Island Sound or even on the New England fishing-banks. It attains great size, individuals having been taken weighing from 600 to 800 pounds. It lives chiefly in deep water, but also seeks the mouths of rivers and estuaries. It breeds from April till July, and in April, and especially in May, large numbers come ashore to lay their eggs, which are much esteemed and eagerly sought for. The animal itself is celebrated as the source of real turtle soup. The Pacific species ranges along the whole southern coast of California, and is regularly taken to the San Francisco markets.—Hawk-billed or hawk's-bill turtle, a marine turtle, the caret, Eretmochelys imbricata, the source of commercial tortoise-shell. See cut under ermochelys.—Loggerhead turtle, see loggerhead, 4. Mock turtle, see mock.—Painted turtle, same as paint.—Painted terrapin (which see, under terrapin).—Soft-shelled or soft turtle. Turtur (tèr'tèr), n. [NL., < L. turtur, a turtle: see *turtle*¹.] A genus of doves, based by Selby in 1835 upon the common turtle of Europe, Columba turtur of Linnaeus, now called Turtur communis, vulgaris, or auritus. (See cut under turtle-dove.) There are many other Old World species, among them T. risorius, probably the turtle of Scripture.

turves, n. An obsolescent plural of *turf*¹.
turvy-topsy, adv. Same as topsy-turvy. Cited by F. Hall, The Nation, March 23, 1880, p. 268.

turwar (tur'wār), n. [E. Ind.] The tanning-bark obtained in India from Cassia auriculata.

Tuscan (tus'kan), a. and n. [= F. Toscan, < It. Toscana, < L. Tuscanus, < Tuscus, Thuscus, Tuscan. Cf. Etruscan.] I. a. Pertaining to Tuscany, a former grand duchy, now a compartment of the present kingdom of Italy, corresponding generally to the ancient Etruria.—Tuscan order, one of the five orders of architecture, according to Vitruvius and Palladio. It admits of no ornaments, presents the lack of refinement of the other Roman orders, and the columns are never fluted. It differs so little, however, from the Roman Doric that it is generally regarded as being only a variety of the latter. See Doric.—Tuscan straw, plaited straw of fine yellow color, used for making hats and fine mats and baskets.

II. n. 1. An inhabitant of Tuscany.—2. In arch., the Tuscan order.

tush¹ (tush), n. [ME. tusch, tosch; an assimilated form of *tush*².] A long pointed tooth; a tusk; specifically, one of the four canine teeth of the horse.

That great wolf (Gardiner), . . . whose teeth are like to the venomous toshes of the ramping lion.
Beacon, Works (Parker Soc.), III. 237.

And whom he strikes his crooked tushes slay.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 624.

tush² (tush), interj. [Formerly also twish; cf. tut and push.] An exclamation expressing rebuke, impatience, or contempt, and equivalent to 'pshaw! be silent!': as, tush! tush! never tell me such a story as that.

There is a choleric or disdainful interjection used in the Irish language called Boagh, which is as much in English as tush.
Stanhurst, Descrip. of Ireland, i. (Holinshed's Chron., I.).

Tush, man; in this topsy-turvy world friendship and bosom-kindness are but made covers for mischief, means to compass ill.
Chapman, Widow's Tears, v.

tush² (tush), v. i. [*tush*², interj.] To express impatience, contempt, or the like by the exclamation "Tush!"

Cedric tushed and pshawed more than once at the message.
Scott, Ivanhoe, xlv.

tushed (tusht), a. [*tush*¹ + -ed.] Having tushes; tusked.

tusk¹ (tusk), n. [ME. tusk, also transposed tux (also assimilated tusch, tosch: see *tush*¹), < AS. tusc, also transposed tux = OFries. tusk, tusch = Icel. toskr (cf. Gael. toag, < E.), a tusk, tooth; prob., with orig. adj. formative -k or -sk (as in AS. -isc, Goth. -ish), from the orig. form of tooth (AS. tōth, Goth. tinthus, etc.), the radical th + k or th + sk reducing to sk, as th + t or th + st reduces to st. The supposition that AS. tusc is a contr. of twisc*, < twi, two, though phonetically tenable (cf. tuskar, twiscar), does not meet the sense.] 1. A long pointed tooth; especially, a tooth long enough to protrude from the lips when the mouth is closed. Tusks are extremely prominent in some animals, as elephants, mastodons, and other proboscideans; the narwhal among cetaceans; various pachyderms, as the hippopotamus, boar, and babirusa; the walrus among piniped carnivores; and the fossil saber-toothed tigers among ordinary a, tusk of walrus (canine tooth); b, tusk of elephant (incisor tooth).

carnivores. Tusks may be upper or lower; they are usually upper, but in the dinotherium lower. They are either incisors or canines in different animals, but are usually canines. They are always paired, except in the narwhal. The single developed upper incisor of the male narwhal is the longest tusk known, reaching a length of 10 or 12 feet, and it is spirally grooved as if twisted. Elephants' tusks are upper incisors, and furnish most of the ivory of commerce. The tusks of the walrus are upper canines; those of the boar tribe are canines, both upper and lower. The tusks of the dinotherium are a pair of lower incisors turned down out of the mouth. The so-called tusks or tushes of the horse are ordinary canines. See cuts under babirusa, boar, Dinotherium, elephant, Mastodontine, monodon, narwhal, Phacocherus, saber-toothed, and walrus.

But bit his lip for felonious despoight,
And gnash't his yron tuskes at that displeasing sight.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. x. 33.

2. A sharp projecting point resembling in some degree a tusk or tooth of an animal. Specifically—(a) A tooth of a harrow. (b) The share of a plow.

Shortly plough or harrow Shall pass o'er what was Ismail, and his tusk
Be unimpeded by the proudest mosque.

Byron, Don Juan, vii. 63.

(c) In locks, a sharp projecting point or claw which forms a means of attachment or engagement.

3. In carp., a bevel shoulder on a tenon to give it additional strength.—4. A tooth-shell. See Dentalium, and cut under tooth-shell.

tusk¹ (tusk), v. [tusk¹, n.] I. trans. 1. To gore with the tusks.

My poor mistress went distract and mad
When the boar tusk'd him. Keats, Endymion, iii.

2. To move, turn, or thrust with the tusks.

The wilde boare has tusked up his vine.
Dekker, Londons Tempe (Works, ed. Pearson, IV. 120).

II. † intrans. To gnash the teeth, as a boar; show the tusks.

Never tusk, nor twirl your dibble; . . . you shall not fight me with your lion-chap, sir, nor your tusks.

B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, ii. 1.

tusk² (tusk), n. [A reduced form of torsk. Cf. tusk.] A fish: same as torsk.

tusk³ (tusk), n. [Early mod. E. tuske, also assimilated tushe; cf. Dan. tuska, a tuft, tassel, Sw. dial. tuss, a wisp of hay; cf. also W. tus, tuswe, a wisp, bundle. The relations of these forms are uncertain. Cf. tussock.] A tuft; a bush. Palsgrave.

tuskar (tus'kär), n. [Also tushkar, twiscar; < Icel. torfskeri, a turf-cutting (cf. torfskurdr, turf-cutting, < torf, turf, < skera, cut: see turf and shear).] An implement of iron with a wooden handle, for cutting peat. [Orkney and Shetland.]

tusked (tuskt), a. [tusk¹ + -ed².] Having tusks; tusky: used in heraldry only when the tusks are of a different tincture from the rest of the bearing. Also tushed.

His wide mouth did gape

With huge great teeth, like to a tusked Bore.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. vii. 5.

tuskee (tus'kē), n. [Amer. Ind.] The prairie-turnip, Psoralea esculenta. See Psoralea.

tusker (tus'ker), n. [tusk¹ + -er¹.] An elephant whose tusks are grown and retained.

Every one knows that elephants are found there [in Ceylon], but it is not so generally known that tuskers are so rare that not one male in 300 has tusks.

W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 587.

tusk-shell (tusks'hel), n. A tooth-shell: same as tusk¹, 4.

tusk-tenon (tusks'ten'on), n. A tenon strengthened by having a shoulder or step on the lower side. This form has the advantage of permitting the mortise into which it enters to be cut at a higher point in a horizontal beam, thus weakening the latter less than if cut at or below the neutral line of deflection.

Tusk-tenon.
A, tenon; B, tusk.

tusk-vase (tusks'väs), n. A decorative vase formed of a part of the tusk of an elephant, hollowed and mounted with the point downward on a stand; hence, a vase of any material resembling a tusk so mounted.

tusky (tus'ki), a. [tusk¹ + -y¹.] Having tusks; tusked: as, the tusky boar. Pope, Odyssey, xiv. 124.

tusmoset, n. See tuzzimuzzy.

tussah-silk (tus'ä-silk), n. Same as tusser-silk. Spens' Encyc. Manuf., I. 520.

tussal (tus'al), a. [tussis + -al.] Relating to or caused by cough.

tussemoset, n. See tuzzimuzzy.

tusser (tus'er), n. [Also tussur, tussore, tussek, tussah, tussa, tassar; prob. at first in comp. tusser-silk, lit. 'shuttle-silk,' perhaps from the form of the cocoon (Yule), < Hind. tassar, < Skt. tassara, trasura, shuttle.] 1. Same as tusser-silk.—2. An oak-feeding silkworm, Antheraea mylitta, furnishing a silk of great strength, but of coarse quality and hard to reel.

tusser-silk (tus'er-silk), n. The raw silk produced by various silkworms other than the ordinary Serica mori, as by Antheraea mylitta. The silk is naturally of a dark fawn-color; the cloths made from it are generally plainly woven, without patterns, brocading, or even cords.

tusser-worm (tus'er-wörm), n. Same as tusser, 2.

tusses (tus'ez), n. pl. [Appar. for tushes, pl. of tush, var. of tusk: cf. tusk¹, n., 3.] Projecting stones left in masonry to tie in the wall of a building intended to be subsequently annexed. Halliwell.

And also forsaide Richarde sall schote out tusses in the west ende for makynge of a steppill.

Contract for Catterick Church, Yorkshire (1412), quoted in [N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 490.]

tussicular (tu-sik'ü-lär), a. < [L. tussicularis, < tussicula, dim. of tussis, cough.] Of or pertaining to a cough.

Tussilago (tus-i-lä'gō), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700; earlier in Lobel, 1576), < L. tussilago, the herb coltsfoot.] A genus of composite plants, of the tribe Senecionideæ, type of the subtribe Tussilagineæ. It is characterized by radiate flower-heads with erect uniseriate involucre bracts, the disk-flowers with undivided styles. The only species, T. Farfara, the coltsfoot, is widely distributed through north temperate regions in the Old World, in America naturalized in the North Atlantic States and Canada. It is a perennial herb, more or less covered with snowy wool, growing from a deep-seated rootstock. The leaves are radical, large and roundish, and somewhat angulate; the flower-heads are yellow, of medium size, and solitary upon a scale-bearing scape. See coltsfoot (with cut), and compare coughwort and foxfoot.

tussis (tus'is), n. [L.] In med., a cough. Compare peritussis. [Now rare.]

tussle (tus'l), n. [Formerly also tussel; a var., with shortened vowel, of tousle: see tousle.] A struggle; a conflict; a scuffle. [Colloq.]

"It is some comfort, when one has had a sair tussel," continued the captain, . . . "that it is in a fair leddy's service."

Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, li.

tussle (tus'l), v. i.; pret. and pp. tussled, ppr. tussling. [tussle, n.] To struggle; wrestle confusedly; scuffle. [Colloq.]

tussock (tus'ok), n. [Formerly also tussuck, supposed to be another form, with accom. dim. suffix -ock, of tusk³.] 1. A clump, tuft, or small hillock of growing grass.—2. Same as tuft², 1.

There should not any such tussocks nor tufts be seen as there be, nor such laying out of the hair.

Latimer, Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1550.

3. A tussock-moth, as of the genus Orgyia (which see); a vapor: so called from the tufted larvæ. The larva of the white-marked tussock, O. leucostigma, is a very destructive caterpillar in the United States. The pale tussock is the European O. pudibunda: so called in England.

4. Same as tussock-grass.

tussock-caterpillar (tus'ok-kat'er-pil-lär), n. The larva of any tussock-moth.

tussock-grass (tus'ok-gräs), n. 1. A tall and elegant grass, Poa flabellata (Dactylis cæspitosa), a native of the Falkland Islands, Tussock-grass (Poa flabellata).

It grows in great tufts or tussocks sometimes 5 or 6 feet in height, the long tapering leaves gracefully recurved. The plant is highly nutritious, containing a large amount of saccharine matter, and is sought after by cattle. Several attempts have been made to establish it in seaside districts in Scotland.

2. In Australia, a plant of the lily family, Lomandra (Xerotes) longifolia, considered the best native substitute for esparto. Though it is of taller growth in wet ground, the best quality is from dry lands.

Also called mai-rush. Spens' Encyc. Manuf.

3. A tufted grass, Aira cæspitosa. Britten and Holland. [Prov. Eng.]

tussock-moth (tus'ok-mōth), n. One of various bombycid moths whose larvæ are tufted; a tussock; a vapor: as, the hickory tussock-moth, Halesidota caryæ, the larva of which feeds mainly on the foliage of hickory, but also upon other forest- and orchard-trees in the United States. See cut under Orgyia.

tussock-sedge (tus'ok-sej), n. A sedge-plant, Carex stricta, growing in swampy grounds in dense clumps, the bases of which at length become elevated into hummocks.

tussocky (tus'ok-i), a. [tussock + -y¹.] Abounding in or resembling tussocks or tufts.

tussore, n. Same as tusser.

tussucki, n. An old spelling of tussock.

tussyt, n. An old spelling of tuzzy.

tut¹ (tut), v. i. [Var. of toot¹, toie¹.] To project.

tut² (tut), n. [Also tote: see tut¹, v., and toot¹.] A hassock; a footstool. [Prov. Eng.]

Paid for a tut for him that draws the bellows of the organ: to sit upon. Ivd.

Chardens Accounts of Cheddle, 1637. (Davies.)

tut³ (tut), n. [Also tote; origin obscure.] A piece of work; a job.

tut⁴ (tut), v. i.; pret. and pp. tutted, ppr. tutting [tut³, n.] To do work by the tut or tote; w. by the piece. Grose. [Prov. Eng.]

tut⁴ (tut), interj. [Cf. tush² and trut.] An exclamation used to check or rebuke, or to express impatience or contempt. It is synonymous with tush².

Tut, tut!

Grace me no grace, nor uncle me no uncle.
Shak., Rich. II., ii. 3. s.

Tut, I am confident in thee, thou shalt see't.
B. Jonson, Volpone, ii. 1.

tut⁴ (tut), v. i.; pret. and pp. tutted, ppr. tutting [tut⁴, interj.] To express impatience, contempt, or the like by the interjection tut.

In another moment the member of parliament had gotten the statish, and was pishing and tutting over the Globe or the Sun.

Bulwer, Caxtons, viii.

tutage (tū'tāj), n. [L. tutari, protect, defend] + -age; or, rather, an error for tutelage (†). An object of tutelage; tutelage.

Trim up her golden tresses with Apollo's sacred tree, Whose tutage and especial care I wish her still to be.

Drayton, Eclogues, ii.

tutamen (tū-tā'men), n.; pl. tutamina (-tām'nā). [L. defense, protection, < tutari, watch, protect, defend, freq. of tueri, watch: see tution.] In anat., a defense or protection; that which makes safe or preserves from injury.—Tutamina cerebri, the scalp, skull, and membranes the brain.—Tutamina oculi, the eyelids and their appendages.

tutament (tū'tā-ment), n. [L. tutamentum, protection, defense, < tutare, watch, protect, defend: see tutamen.] Protection.

The holy Crosse is the true Tutament, Protecting all ensheltered by the same.

Davies, Holy Rood, p. 19. (Davies.)

tutamina, n. Plural of tutamen.

tutania (tū-tā'ni-ä), n. [NL., an intentional accidental variant of tutia: see tutty².] The trade-name of a variety of Britannia metal. The word is not in common use, and the reported alloys said to be called by the name tutania differ greatly from each other. So-called "English tutania" (according to Bioms) is an alloy of equal parts of tin, antimony, bismuth, and brass.

tutet, v. An obsolete form of toot¹, toot².

tutelage (tū'te-lāj), n. [tutete + -age]. Protection; guardianship: as, the king's right of seignior and tutelage.

The childhood of the European nations was passed under the tutelage of the clergy. Macaulay, Hist. Eng.

2. The state of being under a guardian; custody or protection enjoyed.

Your wisdom is too ripe to need instruction
From your son's tutelage. Ford, Broken Heart, tutelar (tū'te-lär), a. [= F. tutelaire = Sp. P. tutelar = It. tutelaire, < LL. tutularis, < L. tutelare, a watching, guardianship, protection: see tutele.] 1. Having the guardianship or charge of protecting a person or a thing; guardian: protecting: as, tutelar genii; tutelar goddesses.

God, that dwells in us, will sustain the building a repair the building out of ourselves: that is, he will ma us tutelar angels to one another. Donne, Sermons,

2. Pertaining to a protector or guardian; tending to guard or protect; protective: as, tutelar powers. Landor.

tutelary (tū'te-lä-ri), a. [LL. tutelaris: see tutelar.] Same as tutelar.

I could easily believe that not only whole countries but particular persons have their tutelary and guardian angel.
Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, i. 3.

tutelet (tū'tēl), n. [F. tutele = Sp. Pg. tutela, < L. tutela, a watching, guardianship, protection, < tueri, pp. tutius, tutus, watch, guard: see tuition.] Guardianship; tutelage.

He was to have the Tutele and Ward of his Children.
Howell, Letters, i. li. 1.

tutenag (tū'te-nag), n. [Also tutenague, too nague, formerly tuthinag, toothenague; < L. tutenague, tutenague, toutenague, toutenague, tut nac, tintenague, etc., = Sp. Pg. tutenaga; prob. < Pers. Ar. tūtiya, an oxid of zinc (see tutty² + (†) Pers. -nāk, an adj. suffix, or Hind. nāga, lead.) The name given to the zinc imported Europe from China and the East Indies, and merely, especially in the second half of the nineteenth century, an article of considerable commercial importance—this metal having been purchased by the Dutch in China and by them distributed through the East Indies and applied to India proper, whence more or less it found its way to Europe, where its manufacture seems to have been begun on a small scale, both in Germany and in England, about 1800.

It is said that the name tutenag was first given to alloy imported from the East by the Portuguese, and that this alloy was the gong-metal of the Chinese, which is a variety of bronze. This would seem to be probable, as the first mention of this alloy, so far as known, is that of Libavia, who, in his work "De Natura Metallorum," published in 1697, describes a white bronze (as alba), which he says is not zinc, but a peculiar kind of brought from the East Indies, and which is sonorous, which reason it was called by the Spaniards tintinaso, tinintinnare, 'to resound.' Whether this name was a variant of tutenag (also spelled in a great variety of other ways, among which tintinnage) or an independent designation of the alloy is not known. The whole matter of early nomenclature of zinc is extremely obscure. See Encyc. Brit., VI. 925.

tutorism (tū'ti-gr-izm), n. [< L. tutor, com- of. tutor, safe (pp. of tueri, watch, guard: -tution), + -ism.] Rigorism, especially in a did form.

tutorist (tū'ti-gr-ist), n. [< tutor(ism) + -ist.] A rigorist; especially, one who holds the doctrines of rigorism in a less rigid or severe form. tutivillust, n. [ML.: see titivill.] A demon who was said to collect all the fragments of words which the priests had skipped over or mutilated in the performance of the service, and to carry them to hell. Halliwell.

Tutivillust, the devil of hell,
He wryeth her names, sothe to tel,
admissa extrahentes. . .
For his love that gow der boght,
Hold gow still, and fangel north,
sordem aperte deprecantes.

Rel. Antiq., I. 257.

g-mouthed† (tut'moutht), a. Having a protruding under jaw. Holland.

g-nose (tut'nōz), a. A snub-nose. [Prov. Eng.] tutor (tū'tor), n. [Early mod. E. also tutour, tutor; < ME. tuteur, < OF. tuteur, F. tuteur = Sp. g. tutor = It. tutore, < L. tutor, a watcher, protector, guardian, < tueri, protect: see tuition.]

The legal sense the word is directly from the tutor. 1. A guardian.

and kynde wit be wardeyn goure welthe to kepe, and tutour of 3owre tresoure and take his gow atte nede.
Piers Plowman (C), ii. 52.

I'll have mine own power here,
Mine own authority; I need no tutor.
Fletcher, Double Marriage, v. 1.

The guardian—the tutor in Scottish phrase—of the orphans and their land.

E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, V. 252.

In law, the guardian of a boy or girl in puberty.

In the absence of other provision, the father is the tutor, or failing him there may be a tutor nominate, a tutor ad litem or a tutor dative. A tutor nominate is one nominated in a testament, etc., by the father (or the child or children to be placed under guardianship).

A father may nominate any number of tutors. A tutor-at-law is one who acquires his right by the mere disposition of law, in cases where there is no tutor nominate, or where the tutor nominate is dead, or cannot act, or has not accepted.

A tutor dative is one named by the sovereign on the failure of both tutors nominate and tutors-at-law.

In civil law it was originally considered as a right of the nearest relative to be named the tutor in order to preserve the fortune for the family, and it was only gradually that the protection of the infant himself came to be considered the principal object, and the filling of the office of tutor more as a duty which had to be fulfilled unless there were special circumstances to excuse, than as a right which a relative could claim.

3. One who has the care of instructing another in various branches or in any branch of learning; a private instructor; also, a teacher or instructor in anything.

Thou shalt be as thou wast,
The tutor and the feeder of my riots.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., v. 5. 66.

In Eng. universities, an officer who is specially intrusted with the care of the undergraduates of his college.

By the middle of the sixteenth century, the modern system of admitting students not on the foundation was fully established; and, as a natural result, the office of tutor in the present meaning of the term then first appears, being probably introduced at King's Hall, the chief of the earlier foundations absorbed in Trinity College, "where the students were much younger than elsewhere."

Quarterly Rev., CXLV. 403.

The college officer with whom the Undergraduate has most frequent contact is the Tutor. He not only directs the studies of his pupils, but also deals with them in all points, material as well as intellectual. He collects the College-rolls, and generally acts as agent for the College in all business transactions with its members. . . The Tutor himself does not necessarily lecture or teach.

Dickens's Dict. of Cambridge, p. 124.

5. In U. S. colleges, a teacher subordinate to a professor, usually appointed for a year or a term of years.

tutor (tū'tor), v. t. [< tutor, n.] 1. To have the guardianship or care of.—2. To instruct; teach.

Then gave I her, . . . tutor'd by my art,
A sleeping potion. Shak., R. and J., v. 3. 243.
She trills her song with tutored powers,
Or mocks each casual note.

Wordsworth, The Contrast, i.

tutorage (tū'tor-āj), n. [< tutor + -age.] The office, occupation, or authority of a tutor or guardian; guardianship.

Children care not for the company of their parents or tutors, and men will care less for theirs, who would make them children by usurping a tutorage.

Government of the Tongue.

tutoress (tū'tor-es), n. [Formerly also tuteresse, tutress; < tutor + -ess.] A female tutor, an instructress; a governess.

What a good helper, what a true instructor!

In all good arts a tutress and conductor.

Heywood, Dialogues (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, VI. 177).

tutorial (tū'tō-ri-al), a. [< LL. tutorius, belonging to a guardian (< L. tutor, a guardian: see tutor), + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or exercised by a tutor or instructor.

The Commissioners had two purposes plainly before them, which events have shown to be incompatible in the form which they were made to take. The one was to enlarge and strengthen the Professoriate, the other was to extend and encourage what is called the Tutorial system, by which is meant the instruction of the undergraduates in work for their examinations by certain College officials.

Contemporary Rev., LVI. 925.

tutorially (tū'tō-ri-al-i), adv. In a tutorial manner; as a tutor. The Academy, Jan. 31, 1891, p. 102.

tutorism (tū'tor-izm), n. [< tutor + -ism.] The office, state, or duty of a tutor or of tutors; tutorship. North British Rev. [Rare.]

tutorly† (tū'tor-li), a. [< tutor + -ly†.] Like, befitting, or belonging to a tutor; pedagogic.

The King had great reason to be weary of the Earl, who was grown so infirm, peevish, and forgetful, as also not a little tutorly in his Majesty's affairs.

Roger North, Examen, p. 453. (Davies.)

tutorship (tū'tor-ship), n. [< tutor + -ship.] 1. Guardianship; tutelage.

This young Duke William, the second of that name and seventh Duke of Normandy, being under tutorship, and not of himself to govern the country.

Versteegan, Rest. of Decayed Intelligence (ed. 1628), p. 169.

2. The office of a tutor or instructor.

tutory (tū'tor-i), n. [< tutor + -y†.] Tutorship; tutorage; guardianship; instruction.

The guardianship or tutorie of a king.

Holmshed, Hist. Scotland, an. 1524 (Chron. I.).

Their reciprocal prospective rights of tutory were defeated, and the minutio of either tutor or ward put an end to a subsisting guardianship.

Encyc. Brit., XX. 687.

tutrice, n. See tuteur.

tutrix (tū'triks), n. [< LL. tutrix, fem. of L. tutor, a guardian: see tutor.] A female guardian.

The Jacobites submitted to the queen, as tutrix or regent for the prince of Wales, whom they firmly believed she intended to establish on the throne.

Smollett, Hist. Eng., I. vii. § 23.

tutsan (tut'san), n. [Formerly also tutsain; < OF. toutesaine, also tutsan, F. toutesaine, < tout (< L. totus), all, + sain (< L. sanus), sound: see total and sane. Cf. allheal.] A species of St. John's-wort, Hypericum Androsæmum, once regarded as a panacea, or particularly as healing to wounds. Also parkeleaves. Sometimes extended to the whole genus; by Lindley to the order Hypericaceæ.

The healing Tutsan then, and Plantain for a sore.

Drayton, Polyolbion, xiii. 204.

tutti (tōt'ti), a. and n. [It., pl. of tutto, all, < L. totus, pl. toti, all: see total.] 1. a. In music, all the voices or instruments together; concerted: opposed to solo. In concertos the term is applied to passages in which the orchestra is used without the solo instrument. It is also loosely used of any loud concerted passage.

II. n. A concerted movement or passage intended for or performed by all the voices or instruments together, or by most of them: opposed to solo.

They were bent upon a surfeit of music: tuttis, finales, choruses, must be performed.

Loujellon, Hyperion, iv. 4.

tutti-frutti (tōt'ti-frōt'ti), n. [It.] A confection flavored with or containing different kinds of fruit; specifically, ice-cream so made.

tutty† (tut'i, n.; pl. tutties (-iz)). [Also tussy, tosty, and in many other confused forms; partly due to tuzz, tuzzy, q. v., but perhaps in part connected with tut, in sense 'tuff.'] A nosegay; a posy. [Prov. Eng.]

Joan can call by name her cows,
And deck her windows with green boughs;
She can wreathes and tutties make,
And trim with plums a bridal cake.

T. Campton (Arber's Eng. Garner, II. 385).

tutty² (tut'i), n. [Formerly also tuty, tutie; < ME. tutic, < OF. (and F.) tutie = Sp. tutia, autia = Pg. tutia, < ML. tutia, < Ar. Pers. tūtiya, an oxid of zinc. Cf. tutenag.] Impure zinc protoid, collected from the chimneys of smelting-furnaces. It is said also to be found native in Persia. Oppos'd in fight to Theseus.

Cary, tr. of Dante's Purgatory, xxiv. 121.

twifold (twi'fold), adv. [< ME. twyfold; < twifold, a.] In a twofold manner or measure.
[Archaic.]

Your T beard is the fashion,
And twyfold doth express the enamour'd courtier.
Fletcher (and another), Queen of Corinth, iv. 1.

twiforked (twi'fōrk), a. [Also twyforked; *<
twi + fork + -ed*.] Two-forked; biforked.

But this [shaft] exceeds, and with her flaming head,
Twifork'd with death, has struck my conscience dead.
Quarles, Emblems, ii. 13.

twiform (twi'fōrm), a. [Also twyform; < twi+ form.] Same as twiformed.

She had there been left
A guard upon the wain, which I beheld Bound to the twyform beast [the gryphon].
Cary, tr. of Dante's Purgatory, xxiii. 96.

twiformed (twi'fōrm), a. [Also twyformed; < twi + form + -ed.] Having a double form;
biform.

The eye of heaven did rowle the house about
Of that fell twi-form'd Archer.
Davies, Scurge of Folly, p. 23. (Davies.)

twig (twig), n. [ME. twig, twyg (pl. twygges, twygges), with shortened vowel, earlier twig, twi (pl. twiges), with long vowel, < AS. twig
(pl. twiga) = D. twigg = Lt. twich = OHG. twig, zwei, MHG. zwic (zwig), zwei, G. zwieg, a twig, perhaps, with a formative -g, orig. -j, < twi, etc., two, with ref. to a forked twig; cf. twissel, a forked twig, from the same source.] 1. A small shoot of a tree or other plant; a small branch; a spray.

Take ferules eke, or saly twygges take Ye may.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 38.

We like a young childe to a greene twygge, which ye may easilie bende eury way ye list.

Putterham, Arte de Eng. Poesie, p. 205.

Who set the Twigs shall he remember
That is in Haste to sell the Timber?
Prior, Alma, iii.

2. A divining-rod.

The latest revival among old beliefs is that in the divining-rod. "Our liberal shepherds give it a shorter name."
and so do our conservative peasants, calling the "rod of Jacob" the twig.
Cornhill Mag., XLVII. 83.

3. In ceram, a thin strip of prepared clay used in modeling a pottery vessel, especially in the imitation basketwork common in Leeds pottery.
—To hop the twig. See hop. To work the twig, to use the divining-rod. Cornhill Mag., XLVII. 83.

twig (twig), v.; pret. and pp. twigg, ppr.
twigg. [< twig, n.] I. trans. To switch;
beat. Hallivell.

II. intrans. To be vigorous or active; be energetic. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

Ewes yearly by twinning rich masters do make;
The lamb of such twimmers for breeders go take;
For twinnings be twiggers, increase for to bring,
Though some for their *trigg*ing peccavi may sing.
Tusser, January's Husbandry.

twig (twig), v. t.; pret. and pp. twigg, ppr.
twigg. [A var. of twick, unassimilated form of twich; see twick, twich, and cf. twack.] To twich; jerk. [Scotch.]

Not one kynge hath bene in Englande sens the conquest but they have twygged hym one way or other, and had they false flynges at him. Bp. Bale, Apology, fol. 142.

Let pantin-billies twig the string.

An' for another mtekin' ring.
Morison, Poems, p. 78. (Jamieson.)

twig (twig), n. [< twig, v. Cf. twick, twack, n.] A twitch; a jerk; a quick, sudden pull.
Jamieson. [Scotch.]

twig (twig), v.; pret. and pp. trigg, ppr.
trigg. [Prob. < Ir. twigm, I understand, discern, = Gael. twig, understand.] I. trans.
1. To notice; observe narrowly; watch.

Mug, gentlemen of the Corporation of Garratt Heel-Tap. Now, twig him; now, mind him; mark how he hawls his muscles about.

Foote, Mayor of Garratt, fl. 2.

The word seems to have got into English through the unquiet kind of jargon, as in the choice morsel of thieves' cant: "twig the cull, he's peery"; "observe the fellow, he is watching." Macmillan's Mag. (Imp. Dict.)

2. To comprehend; understand; perceive; discover.

From the sudden erubescence of his pallid, ill-fed cheek,
I *twigg*ed at once that he didn't himself know what it meant. Dr. J. Brown, Spare Hours, 1st ser., p. 306.

What is that first instantaneous glimpse of some one's meaning which we have when in vulgar phrase we say we twig it?
W. James, Princ. of Psychology, I. 293.

II. intrans. To understand; see; "catch on."

Don't you twig? T. Hook, Gilbert Garray, III. ii.

"I twig," said Mick. Disraeli, Sybil, p. 10.

[Slang in all uses.]

twig-blight (twig'blit), n. See pear-blight, under blight.

twig-borer (twig'bōr'ér), n. One of numerous small beetles which bore the twigs of trees, as the ptinid Amphicerus bicaudatus, which infests

the grape and the apple in the United States.

twig-bug (twig'bug), n. Same as stick-bug, 1.
twigged (twig), a. [< twig + -ed.] Having twigs or small shoots.

twiggen (twig'n), a. [< twig + -en.] 1.
Made of twigs or osier; wicker.

A large basket or twiggen panier.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, xvii. 10.

2. Covered with osier or wicker.

I'll beat the knave into a twiggen bottle.
Shaks, Othello, ii. 3. 152.

twiggen-work (twig'n-wōrk), n. Wickerwork.

An Indian dish or potager, made of the bark of a tree, with the sides and rim seved together after the manner of twiggenwork. N. Greer, Museum.

twigger (twig'ér), n. 1. One who or that which is active or energetic. Compare twig, v. t.

Twinlings be twiggers, increase for to bring.
Tusser, January's Husbandry.

2. A wanton person of either sex.

Now, Benedicite, her mother said;
And hast thou beene already such a twigger?
Passell's Night Cap (1612). (Nares.)

The mother of her was a good twigger the whilst.
Middleton, No Wit like a Woman's, iv. 1.

twig-girdler (twig'gér'dlér),
n. A longicorn beetle, Oncideres cingulatus, which girdles twigs of apple, oak,
and other trees in the United States, producing a decaying condition of the wood fitting it as food for the larvæ.

twigg (twig'i), a. [< twig
+ -y.] 1. Consisting of or resembling twigs; made of twigs.

Small twigg stalks.

Gerarde, Herball (1599), p. 804.

Oziers . . . are of innumerable kinds, . . . being so much smaller than the Sallows, . . . and requiring constant moisture. It likewise yields more limber and flexible works . . . for all wicker and twigg- y works. Evelyn, Sylva, i. 20.

2. Full of twigs.

They [the black withies] grow the slowest of all the twigg trees. Evelyn, Sylva, i. 20.

twight (twi't), An obsolete past participle of twich.
twight (twi't), v. An erroneous spelling of twit.
Spenser, P. Q., V. vi. 12.

twig-insect (twig'in-sekt), n. Same as stick-bug, 1. Also twig-bug.

"The so-called stick insects," or "walking-twigs," as they are often called, the Phasmide of the naturalist,
"these twigg insects." P. Proctor, Nature studies.

twigless (twig'les), a. [< twig + -less.] Lacking twigs.

Unbranching and twigless stems. Nature, XLII. 151.

twig-pruner (twig'prō'nér), n. A longicorn beetle of the genus Elaphidion. The larvæ of the parallel twig-pruner, E. parallelum, live in the twigs of oak and apple-trees and other forest and fruit-trees in the northern United States, and pupate in their burrows. The beetles oviposit by preference in the ends of twigs, and the larvæ work into the live wood by boring down the center. See under Elaphidion, and compare twig-borer.

twig-rush (twig'rush), n. A plant of the cy-peraceous genus Cadmus, this name as well as the genus name referring to the repeatedly branching cyme of the original species, *C.
Jardineus*. This is a tall perennial tussock plant with long slender leaves toothed on the edges and the keel, found in bogs in most temperate and some tropical regions. It occurs in the western United States, and in the southern part of the Cadmus canadensis var. stricta is included in it. C. nurensis grows northward in North America. There are in all about 33 species.

twigsome (twig'sum), a. [< twig¹ + -some.] Abounding in twigs. [Rare.]

The twigsome trees by the wayside (which, I suppose, will never grow leafy, for they never did).

Dickens, Uncommercial Traveller, vii.

twilight (twi'lit), n. and a. [Formerly also twylight; < ME. twilicht, twyelyghte = LG. twi-lecht = G. zwilicht (cf. MHG. zwischelicht); < twi- + light¹.] 1. n. The light from the sky when the sun is below the horizon at morning and evening. It has generally been agreed by observers in different countries that this light rises in the morning and sets in the evening when the sun is 18° or 19° below the horizon. The former depression is given by Ptolemy, Gemma Frisius, Magini, Kepler, and Gassendi; the value 19° is given by Posidonius and Albazen. Under some circumstances a second twilight appears, separated by an interval of darkness from the first. Twilight is certainly due to reflection from the upper atmosphere, but the phenomenon is somewhat complicated by the zodiacal light.

Twye lyghte, be-fore the day. Diluculum.

Twye lyghte, a-fore the nyghte. Crepusculum.

Prompt. Parv., p. 505.

Twilight no other thing is, Poets say,
Then the last part of night, and first of day.
Herriek, Hesperides, Twilight.

Now came still evening on, and twilight gray
Had in her sober livery all things clad.
Milton, P. L., iv. 598.

2. Hence, any faint light; partial darkness; shade.

Through many a woodland dun,
Through buried paths, where sleepy twilight dreams
The summer time away.
Kents, Endymion, ii.

The oak and birch, with mingled shade,
At noontide there a twilight made.
Scott, L. of the L., iii. 28.

3. Figuratively, an indistinct medium of perception; also, a state of faint or hazy mental illumination.

What shall I do? what conduct shall I find
To lead me through this twy-light of my mind?
Buckingham, Rehearsal, iii. 2.

In the greatest part of our concernment he has afforded us only the twilight of probability, suitable to our state of mediocrity.
Locke.

We are always inwardly immersed in what Wundt has somewhere called the twilight of our general consciousness.
W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 620.

II. a. 1. Belonging, pertaining, or peculiar to twilight; seen by twilight; crepuscular, as a bat or moth.

Nymphs and shepherds . . .
On old Lycæus, or Cyllene hoar,
Trip no more in twilight ranks.
Milton, Arcades, I. 99.

When twilight dews are falling soft
Upon the rosy sea.
Moore, When Twilight Dews.

2. Faintly illuminated; shady; dim; obscure: either literally or figuratively.

Some few sparks or flashes of this divine knowledge may possibly be driven out by rational consideration; philosophy may yield some twilight glimmerings thereof.
Barrow, Sermons, III. xiv.

Twilight groves and dusky caves.
Pope, Eloisa to Abelard, I. 163.

A twilight conscience lighted thro' a chink.
Tennyson, Harold, iii. 1.

Twilight curve, the boundary of the earth's shadow, which rises in the east after the sun has set and cuts off the twilight glow. Within this arc, which sometimes appears very sharply defined, the atmosphere receives no direct light from the sun, and reflects only the diffuse light that comes from other parts of the sky. As the sun descends, the arc rises to the zenith and then passes over to the western horizon, its arrival at the latter point marking the end of twilight.

twilight (twi'lit), v. t. [< twilight, n. The form of the pp. in the second quotation is irregular.] To illuminate faintly or dimly.

The temple's dim cavernous recesses, faintly starred with mosaic, and twilighted by twinkling altar-lamps.
Hovells, Venetian Life, xi.

He was like some one lying in twilit, formless pre-existence.
R. L. Stevenson, Will o' the Mill.

twill¹ (twil), v. t. [Also dial. (Sc.) tweel, twell, twiel, twael; < LG. twillen, make double, also fork into branches, as a tree; cf. LG. twille, twille, twehl, a forked branch, any forked thing; D. tweeling = G. zwilling = Sw. Dan. twilling, twin; Sw. dial. twilla, produce twins (said of sheep); OHG. zwilth, zwilthh, MHG. zwilich, zwilich, G. zwillich, twill (fashioned after L. bilis, having two threads); with formative -l, < twi-, two: see twi-, two, and cf. twi¹.] To weave in a particular way (see twill², n.), producing diagonal ribs in the stuff.

At last she stood complete in her silvery twilled silk, her lace tucker, her coral necklace, and coral ear-drops.
George Eliot, Silas Marner, xi.

twill¹ (twil), n. [< twill², v.] 1. A variety of textile fabric in which the weft-threads do not pass over and under the warp-threads in regular succession, as in common plain weaving, but pass over one and under two, over one and under three, or over one and under eight or ten, according to the kind of twill. The next weft-thread takes a set oblique to the former, throwing up one of the two deposited by the preceding. The effect of this to produce the appearance of parallel diagonal lines or ribs over the whole surface of the cloth; but the regularity of the parallel lines is broken in various ways in what is termed fanciful twilling. The goods so manufactured are stronger than those made by plain weaving. In twilled cloth the number of heddles used is equal to the number of threads contained in the interval between two intersections of the warp and weft, as when every third thread is to be interwoven three leaves are used, for six threads six leaves, etc. Twills are called, according to the number of leaves employed in the weaving, three-leaf twill, six-leaf twill, etc.

Special duties were charged upon Scotch linens called twill and ticking, on importation into England.

S. Dowell, Taxes in England, II. 61.

2. The raised line made by twilling.

A right hand twill is said to appear much bolder if the thread be twisted to the right hand.

A. Barlow, Weaving, p. 99.

Colored twill, a stout cotton material made in all principal colors, and employed for linings of curtains and embroideries. It will not bear washing.—French twill. See French.—Full twills, twilled fabrics of cotton and woolen, usually of plain color.—Herring-bone twill. See herring-bone.—Kirriemuir twill, a fine twilled linen cloth manufactured in Scotland, and often used as a background for embroidery.

twill² (twil), n. [A var. of quill; cf. twilt for quilt.] A reed; a quill; a spool to wind yarn on. [Prov. Eng.]

A Twill; a Spool; from Quill. In the South they call it winding of Quills, because anciently, I suppose, they wound the Yarn upon Quills for the Weavers, though now they use Reeds.
Ray, Eng. Words (1691), p. 77.

twill² (twil), v. t. [< twill², n.] To quill; trim with quilling or fluting.

The great fat pincushion lined with pink inside, and twilled like a lady's nightcap.
Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xvi.

twill³ (twil), prep. and conj. A dialectal variant of it¹.

'twill (twil). A contraction of it will.

twilled (twild), a. [An uncertain word, used only in the following passage. If correctly printed in the original, it may be < twill¹ + -ed², meaning 'ridged, terraced,' or, as commentators say, 'hedged'; or < twill² + -ed², meaning then 'reeded, reedy.' But it is not likely that Shakspeare ever used twill² for quill.] See the etymology.

Thy banks with pioned and twilled brims,
Which spongy April at thy heat betrimms.
Shak., Tempest, iv. 1. 64.

twilt (twilt), n. [A var. of quilt, as twill² for quill¹.] A quilt. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

Beds of state, twilts, pands and testors, napery and broidered wark.
Scott, Bride of Lammermoor, xxvi.

twin¹ (twi), a. and n. [< ME. twin, twyn, twinne, twynne, < AS. getwin, double (pl. getwinnas, twins) (= leel. twinnr, twennr, two and two, twin), < twi-, two: see twi-. Cf. twinning.] See also twine¹.] I. a. 1. Two; twain.

Forr Crist iss bathe Godd & mann,

Ormulum, I. 1361 (Morris and Skeat, I. 52).

A wain that had thair gere wit-in,
That draun was wit oxen twi.
Cursor Mundat, I. 278 (Morris and Skeat, II. 78).

Thou do to gedder x. and ij.
The laghis [laws] *twi*n sal thou finde squa [so].
Holy Rood (ed. Morris), p. 119.

2. Consisting of two separate, closely related, and equal members; twofold; double; specifically, consisting of or forming twins or a pair: as, twin children.

An apple cleit in two is not more twin Than these two creatures. Shak., T. N., v. 1. 302.

Parrots with twin cherries in their beak.
Cowper, Task, I. 38.

3. One, each, or either of two; one of a pair, specifically of two born at a birth: as, a twin brother or sister.

The water up-stod, thurgh godes might,
On twinne hald, also a walp-right.
Genesis and Exodus (E. E. T. S.), I. 3248.

A Boat twin-sister of the crescent-moon!
Wordsworth, Peter Bell.

4. In bot., growing in pairs; didymous.—5. Consisting of two chief parts alike, or nearly alike, and held firmly together: as, a twin bottle; a twin vase. The plural is used in the same sense: as, twin vases.—6. In entom., geminate: applied to spots, punctures, spines, etc., which are close together in pairs, and distant from others.—The Twin Brothers or Brethren, Castor and Pollux; the Twins.

These be the Great Twin Brethren
To whom the Dorians pray.
Macaulay, Battle of Lake Regillus, st. 40.

Twin boat, a boat having two hulls, or a double hull. See twain steamer.—Twin cones. See cone.—Twin crystal. See II. 3.—Twin engine. See engine.—Twin graptolites. See Graptolithina.—Twin ocelli, two similar ocellated spots close together and inclosed in a common colored ring.—Twin-screw, a steam-vessel fitted with two propellers on separate shafts, one under each quarter, having right-handed and left-handed twists respectively. Being turned in contrary directions in driving ahead, they counteract each other's tendencies to produce lateral vibration. Also used attributively.

The Rodney, Admiral Fitzroy's flagship, . . . is also in the Admiralty list called a "twin-screw cruiser," as from her great powers of speed she well may be.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 390.

Twin steam-engine, an adaptation of the steam-engine in which two complete engines are associated to perform the same work; a duplex engine.—Twin steamer, form of steam-vessel occasionally employed in ferries, the deck, etc., being supported on two distinct hulls which are placed some distance asunder, with the paddle-wheels between them.—Twin valve, a form of valve with a double connection, used at the discharge or orifice of a pump, and serving the double purpose of supplying water to a steam-boller and to a line of hose or pipe. E. H. Knight.

Twin Valve, or Double Gate-valve.

II. n. 1. Two; twain; a pair; a couple.

The sharp of the schalk schyndered the bones, & schrank thurz the schyre grege, & scade hit in twynne.
Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), I. 425.

Hit is brused, other broken, other byten in twynne.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), ii. 1047.

I saw the roote in great disdaigne
A twinne of forked trees send forth againe.
Spenser, Visions of Bellay, I. 70.

2. One of two; one of a pair or couple linked together by a particular tie or relation; the mate, counterpart, or fellow of another; specifically, one of two creatures produced at a birth: said of the young both of human beings and of beasts.

He was most princely: ever witness for him
Those twins of learning that he raised in you, Ipswich and Oxford. Shak., Hen. VIII., iv. 2. 68.

Time and Place are twinnings and vnseparable companions.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 60.

Two were never couper.
Cowper, Task, iv. 738.

They see no men,
Not ev'n her brother Arac, nor the twins
Her brethren. Tennyson, Princess, I.

3. A compound crystal one part of which is in a reversed position with reference to the other, as if it had been revolved through 180° about an axis (twinning-axis) perpendicular to a plane which is called the twinning-plane, and is usually a fundamental plane of the given crystal. Thus if (fig. 1) one half of the octahedron as indicated is revolved through 180° about a vertical axis,

1. Octahedron, showing position of twinning-plane. 2. Twinned Octahedron, the upper half in reversed position.

the twinned octahedron of fig. 2 results, the twinning-plane being here a face of the octahedron; such twins are common with spinel, and are hence called spinel twins. This is also called a juxtaposition- or contact-twin, in distinction from a penetration-twin, such as is represented in fig. 3, where each crystal is complete and interpenetrates the other. If the molecular reversal is often repeated in the growth of a crystal, a poly-synthetic twin may result, consisting of successive thin layers or lamellæ of two sets, alternately in reversed position to each other. This is common among the plagioclase feldspars, and is the cause of the fine striation often observed on a cleavage-surface. (See albite twin and pericline twin, below.)

When the angle between the axes of the two parts of the twin crystal is an aliquot part of 360°, repeated twinning may occur (thus, $3 \times 120^\circ$, $4 \times 90^\circ$, $5 \times 72^\circ$, etc., complete the form); the resulting compound crystal may then imitate (mimetic form) a form of higher symmetry than belongs to the single crystal, and hence be a case of pseudosymmetry: for example, the twins of aragonite (which has a prismatic angle not far from 120°) have often the form of a pseudo-hexagonal crystal; the six-rayed stellate twins of cerussite give another common example of a repeated twin.

In some cases the imitation is so perfect that the true nature of the form can be determined only by an investigation in polarized light.—Albite twin, a kind of twin common with albite and the other triclinic feldspars, where the twinning-plane is the brachydiagonal plane of the crystal, and the twinning gives a reentrant angle on basal plane or surface of most perfect cleavage: such as are usually polysynthetic and give rise to a series of lines seen on the basal cleavage-face.—Baveno is a kind of twin crystal of orthoclase feldspar, first met in crystals from Baveno in Italy. The twinning is a clinodome inclined about 45° to the base, and twin has nearly the form of a square prism.—Carlisle twin, a name given to the common twin crystals orthoclase feldspar often observed in granites, trachytes, and other crystalline rocks, as at Carlisle in Nevada. The twinning-axis is here the vertical crystallographic axis, and the twins are commonly of the peritaxial type.—In twain, in twain, in two; apart.

3. Penetration-twin (Cubes).

The king depicted his pupill, put hom in twyn,
In batels on his best wise for bolding hym-selwyn.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 1181.

metagenetic twin, an ordinary twin crystal in which compound structure may be considered to belong to it from the beginning of its formation: sometimes distinguished in distinction from metagenetic twin, where the molecular reversal seems to have begun after the crystal had reached a certain development; the latter kind is testified by the genculated twins of rutile.—Parasitic twin, in teratol. See autotite.—Pericline twin, a twin among with the variety of albite called pericline, also with the other triclinic feldspars, where the twinning-axis is the macrodiagonal axis. Such twins are often polysynthetic, and then give a series of striations on the brachyagonal plane or surface of second cleavage; the direction of these striations varies with the composition of the feldspar according to a definite law.—Spinel twin. See ovine, under def. 3.—The Siamese twins. See Siamese. The Twins, a constellation and sign of the zodiac; minut.

When now no more the alternate Twins are fired
And Cancer roddens with the solar blaze,
Short is the doubtful empire of the Night.

Thomson, Summer, l. 43.

in¹ (twin), v.; pret. and pp. twinned, ppr. twinning. [< twin¹, a.] I. trans. 1. To couple; pair; mate; join intimately or link together: said of two united or of one joined to another.

We were as twinn'd lambs that did frisk i' the sun.
Shak., W. T., l. 2. 67.

In Gemini that noble power is shown That twins their hearts, and doth of two make one.
B. Jonson, Hue and Cry.

True liberty

Is lost, which always with right reason dwells Twinn'd, and from her bath no individual being.
Milton, P. L., xii. 85.

Specifically, in mineral, to form or unite into a compound or twin crystal by a reversal of the molecular structure according to some definite law.

Occasionally a simple form is twinned with a more complex one, as in chabasite. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 363.

II. intrans. 1. To be coupled or paired; be united, as one with another; specifically, to be win-born.

He that is approved in this offence,
Though he had twinn'd with me, both at a birth,
Shall lose me. Shak., Othello, ii. 3. 212.

Were it to plot against the fame, the life
Of one with whom I twinned.
B. Jonson, Sejanus, iii. 3.

2. To bring forth two at a birth.

Ewes yearly by twinning rich masters do make.
Tusser, January's Husbandry, at. 28.

win² (twin), v. [Also twine; < ME. twinnen, twynnen, lit. go in two (cf. in twain, above), < twain, two: see twain. Cf. twine², v.] I. intrans. 1. To be parted in twain; be divided or sundered; come apart.

Ther hit onez is tacheded, twynne wil hit neuer.
Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 2512.

My saule, ihesu, take I to thee
When my body and it all twynne.

That there attendant on the solar power

With borrowed light pursued their narrower way.

Shelley, Queen Mab, ix.

twinkling (twing'king), n. [< ME. twynking, twynkelinge; verbal n. of twynkle, v.] 1. The act of one who or that which twinkles; especially, a quick twitching or fluttering movement of the eye; a wink.

Boys in their first bloom, skilled in the dance, . . . smote the good floor with their feet. And Odysseus gaz'd at the twinklings of the feet, and marvel'd in spirit.

Butcher and Lang, tr. of Homer's Odyssey, vii. (ed. Macmillan, 1881, p. 123).

2. The phenomenon of scintillation of the fixed stars, consisting of fluctuations of light and of color at the rate of from fifty to a hundred per second.

The fluctuations of light did not escape the notice of the ancients; those of color were noticed by Robert Hooke in 1665.

The phenomenon was, without any reason at all, generally supposed to have its origin in the eye, until William Nicholson, the chemist, showed in 1813 that, if the image of a twinkling star was stretched out into a ribbon by an irregular movement of the telescope, the fluctuations would appear as variations of light and color along this ribbon.

Charles Dufour, in 1856, published the following generalizations of his observations now known as Dufour's laws: (1) the pale stars twinkle more than the chrome, and the chrome more than the ruddy ones; (2) at different altitudes the twinkling is proportional to the coefficient of astronomical refraction multiplied by the trajectory of the ray; and (3) the twinkling diminishes as the diameter of the star increases.

Lorenz Respighi, in 1868, examined the effect of twinkling upon the spectra of stars. He found that oblique bands of shade pass over the spectrum in different directions according as the star is east or west of the meridian.

Finally, Charles Montigny, with a special instrument called a scintillometer, has made extensive observations concerning the differences of the rate of twinkling at different seasons, under different meteorological conditions, and for different stars.

It is certain that twinkling is due in some way to the entrance and passage of the light in the atmosphere, but how is not altogether settled. Twinkling is entirely distinct from the "dancing" of stars, which is frequent, especially in winter.

3. The time required for one twinkle or wink as of the eye; a flash; hence, a very short time.

This world in an ages twynkeling

Thou maist distrole, noon may defende.

Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 173.

We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twynking of an eye, at the last trumpet.

[ME. -ty, -ti, < AS. -tig, etc., a suffix, in Goth. a separate noun, a 'ten' or 'decade,' = Goth. tigus; a form of ten, used in numerals see ten, and the words twenty, etc., as cited.] A termination of numerals—namely, in twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, sixty, seventy, eighty, ninety originally meaning 'ten' (twenty, 'twain tens, thirty', 'three tens', etc.).

-ty. [ME. -tie, -tye, -tee, -te, < OF. -te, -tec, F. -té = Sp. -dad = Pg. -dade = It. -tà, -tate, -tade, < L. -tas (-tāt), usually preceded by a stem-vowel -i (-itas, > E. -ity), a suffix used to form abstract nouns from adjectives, as in agility, agility, < agilis, agile, bonitas, goodness, < bonus, good, unitas, oneness, < unus, one, etc.] A suffix appearing in many abstract nouns taken or formed from the Latin, as in agility, anxiety, benignity, humanity, unity, etc. It is commonly preceded, as in these cases, by a stem-vowel -i (the termination -ity being so common as to be often used as an English formative); but in some words the original vowel has disappeared, as in bounty, loyalty, royalty, etc., or none existed in the Latin, as in liberty, poverty, etc. In some words the suffix is not recognized as such, as in city.

tyall, n. [Perhaps irreg. < tie, formerly tye, < -al (?).] A bell-rope, or something tied to a bell for ringing it.

The great bell's clapper was fallen down, the tyall was broken, so that the bishop could not be rung into the town.
Latimer, 6th Serm. bef. Edw. VI., 1640.

Tyburn ticket. A certificate formerly given to the prosecutor of a felon to conviction, the original proprietor or first assignee of it being exempted by a statute of William III. from all parish and ward offices within the parish or ward where the felony had been committed.

tyche (tī'kē), n. [Gr. Τύχη, personification of fortune, a divinity whose protection was believed to assure prosperity, wealth, and good luck; in the form Agathe Tyche (Good Fortune). Compare agathodæmon.

tychonic (tī-kon'ik), a. [Gr. Τύχο (see def.) + -ic.] Pertaining to Tycho Brahe, a famous Danish astronomer (1546–1601), or to his system of astronomy.

The Copernican hypothesis is more probable than the tychonic.

Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., x.

tycoon (tī-kōn'), n. [Also taikun, taicoon; < ap. taikun, 'great prince'; < Chinese ta, great, -kun, prince; said to have been coined in 1854 by a preceptor of Iyesada, the shogun, as a fitting title for his master in the treaty which he was then concluding with Commodore Perry. The phrase, however, seems to have been used much earlier, having been applied to Iyemitsu (1623–49), the third of the Tokugawa shoguns, in a letter sent by his government to Korea, in order to impress the "barbarian" Koreans with his greatness. The title by which the shoguns of Japan were known to foreigners from the signing of the treaty negotiated in 1854 by Commodore Matthew Perry, on behalf of the United States, and Iyesada, the shogun and supposed "temporal emperor" of Japan, to the end of the shogunate in 1868, but never recognized by the Japanese.

The style Tai Kun, Great Prince, was borrowed, in order to convey the idea of sovereignty to foreigners, at the time of the conclusion of the Treaties.

Milford, Tales of Old Japan, p. 5.

tycoonate (tī-kō'nāt), n. [tycoon + *-ate*³.] The shogunate.

tyde, n. An obsolete spelling of *tide*¹.

tydy, n. An obsolete spelling of *tidy*².

tyel, n. An obsolete or archaic spelling of tyel. (ti), n. 1. An obsolete or archaic spelling of tyel.—2. Naut., the part of a topsail-halyard which passes through a block or sheave-hole in the masthead, and is attached to the yard.

Peak-tye. See *peak*¹.

tye (tī), n. [Cf. tye, v.] In mining, a kind of narrow buddle used with a quick current of water for roughly washing tin or lead ore.

tye (tī), v. t.; pret. and pp. tyed, ppr. tying. Perhaps ult. < AS. thwēdan, wash: see *towel*¹. To wash with the tye, as ore. Compare *tye*², n. tye-block (tī-blok), n. In heavy ships, a block on the topsail-yard through which the tye is drawn, the standing part being made fast to the masthead.

tyert, n. An obsolete spelling of *tier*¹, *tier*⁵.

tye-wig, n. A variant of tie-wig.

typhoon, n. An obsolete spelling of typhoon.

tygt, n. An obsolete spelling of tyg.

tygert, n. An obsolete spelling of tiger.

tying (tī'ing), n. [Verbal n. of tyel, v.] The act of fastening with a string, rope, or chain; also, a fastening; as, the tyings were of blue silk.

tykt, v. An old spelling of *tyck*¹.

tyket, n. See *tyke*².

tyket, n. An obsolete form of *tyck*².

Tylenchus (tī-leng'kus), n. [NL., also Tylenchus (Bastian, 1865), < Gr. τύλος, a knot, knob, + ἔγχος, a spear.] A genus of minute parasitic nematode worms, of the family Anguillulidae. Some of them do much damage to crops, as the wheat-worm, T. tritici, which causes the disease called ear-rot and wheat-blight, and T. devastatrix, the stem-rot-worm of clover. Some of these worms were early known as tylari, and they were formerly placed in the more comprehensive genus Anguillula.

tyler, n. An obsolete or archaic form of tiler.

Tylerism (tī'lér-izm), n. [Gr. Τύλος (see def.) + -ism.] 1. A phase of New England Calvinism named from Dr. Bennett Tyler of Connecticut (1783–1858). It reaffirmed the positions of the older Calvinism concerning divine sovereignty, as against the positions of Taylorism. Out of Dr. Tyler's controversy with Dr. Taylor of New Haven grew the theological seminary now at Hartford, Connecticut.

2. In U. S. politics, the methods of President Tyler. See Tylerize.

Tylerize (tī'lér-iz), v. i.; pret. and pp. Tylerized, ppr. Tylerizing. [Gr. Τύλος (see def.) + -ize.] In U. S. politics, to follow the example of President Tyler (1841–5), who turned against the Whig party, to which he owed his office; become a renegade to one's party while holding an office conferred by it.

The Democratic party evidently had two ways of returning, or trying to return, to office and power. They might either assail and unseat the Administration, or else persuade the Executive to Tylerize.

The Nation, I. 227.

tyli, n. Plural of tylus.

tyllt, tyllet, prep. Obsolete forms of *till*².

tyllet, n. See *tillet*².

Tylophora (tī-lof'ō-rā), n. [NL. (R. Brown, 1808), from the thick fleshy segments of the staminal corona; < Gr. τύλος, a knot, knob, + φάρος, < φέρω = E. *bear*¹.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Asclepiadaceæ and tribe Marsdeniæ. It is characterized by a somewhat wheel-shaped corolla with a corona of five fleshy scales laterally compressed and introrsely adnate to the staminal-tube, and by small globose or ovoid pollen-masses. There are about 40 species, natives of Africa, Asia, and Australasia. They are shrubby or herbaceous twiners, or rarely partially erect; they bear opposite leaves and small cymose flowers. T. (Hoya) barbata is sometimes cultivated; for T. asthmatica, see Indian ipecac, under ipecac.

tylopod (tī-lop'od), a. and n. [Gr. τύλος, a knot, knob, callus, + ποδ- (pod- = E. foot.] 1. a. Having padded instead of hooved digits; having the ends of the digits like pads; of or pertaining to the Tylopoda; phalangigrade, as a camel.

II. n. A member of the Tylopoda, as a camel or llama.

Tylopoda (tī-lop'ō-dā), n. pl. [NL. (Illiger, 1811, as a family of his Bisulca: see tylopod.] The tylopod or phalangigrade artiodactyl ruminants, represented by one family, the Camelidae. The feet are tyloped; the lower part of the thigh is exerted from the trunk of the body; the lower canines are specialized; the lateral upper incisors are persistent; the stomach is incompletely quadripartite; and the placenta is diffuse. More fully called Pecora tylopoda, and also Phalangigrada.

tylopodous (tī-lop'ō-dus), a. Same as tylopod.

tylosis (tī-lō'sis), n.; pl. tyloses (-sēz). [Gr. τύλος, a knot, knob, callus, + -osis.] 1. In bot., a growth formed in the cavity of a duct by the intrusion of the wall of a contiguous cell through one or more of the perforations of the duct.

—2. An affection of the eyelids characterized by an indurated thickening of their edges.

3. Same as leucoplasia.—4. Callosity.

tylostylar (tī-lō-stī'lār), a. [Gr. τύλος, a knot, knob, callus, + -stylar.] Of or pertaining to a tylostyle; resembling a tylostyle; knobbed at one end and pointed at the other, like a dressing-pin.

tylostyle (tī-lō-stīl), n. [Gr. τύλος, a knot, lump, knob, + στυλος, a pillar: see *style*².] In sponges, a supporting spicule of cylindrical form, knobbed at one end and pointed at the other.

tylostylus (tī-lō-stī'lus), n.; pl. tylostyli (-lī). [NL.: see tylostyle.] A tylostyle.

Tylosurus (tī-lō-sū'rus), n. [NL. (Cocco), irreg. < Gr. τύλος, a knot, lump, + οὐρά, a tail.] A genus of garfishes, of the family Belontiæ, differing from Belone in the absence of gill-rakers and vomerine teeth. These gar are comparatively large (3 or 4 feet long) voracious fishes of most seas. The species are numerous, and some of them, as T. longirostris (or marinus), are known as bill-fish and needle-fish, from the long sharp jaws. See cut under Belontiæ.

tylotate (tī-lō-tāt), a. [Gr. τύλος, a knot, knob, + *-ate*¹.] Knobbed at both ends, as a sponge-spicule; having the character of a tylole. Sollas.

tylote (tī-lōt), n. [Gr. τύλος, verb. adj. of τύλω, make knotty, < τύλος, a knot, knob.] A tylole sponge-spicule; a simple spicular ray of the monaxon biradiate type, or a rhabdus, knobbed at each end. A tylole knobbed at one end and pointed at the other becomes a tyloleoxa or tylostyle. Sollas.

tyloti, n. Plural of tylole.

tylotic (tī-lōt'ik), a. [Gr. τύλος, a knot, knob, + -ic.] Of or relating to tylosis.

tyloleoxa (tī-lō-tok'sē-ā), n.; pl. tyloleoxæ (-ē). [Gr. τύλος, knobbed, + ὄξης, sharp, keen.] A tylole knobbed at one end and pointed at the other; a tylostyle. Sollas.

tyloleoxate (tī-lō-tok'sē-āt), a. [Gr. τύλοξ, knobbed, + *-ate*¹.] Knobbed at one end and pointed at the other, as a sponge-spicule of the rhabdus type; having the character of a tyloleoxa. Sollas.

tylotus (tī-lō'tus), n.; pl. tyloti (-tī). [NL., < Gr. τύλος, knobbed: see tylole.] A tylole.

tylus (tī'lus), n.; pl. tyli (-lī). [NL., < Gr. τύλος, a knot, knob, lump, protuberance.] In heteropterous insects, a central anterior division of the upper surface of the head, often projecting in front, and separated by depressed lines from the two lateral lobes.

tymbal, n. See timbal.

tymbalant (tim'bā-lon), n. A false form of tymbal.

War-music, bursting out from time to time

With gong and tymbalant's tremendous chime.

Moore, Lalla Rookh, Veiled Prophet.

tympan (tim'p), n. [Shortened from tympano or tympanum.] 1. In the blast-furnace, the crown of the opening in front of the hearth, a little below and in front of which is the dam-stone. The tympan is sometimes a masonry arch (the tympan-arch), sometimes a block of refractory stone (the tympan-stone), and sometimes a hollow box or block of iron (the tympan-plate) through which water is kept constantly circulating, so as to protect it from the heat and the corrosive action of the slag.

2. In coal-mining, a cap or lid; a short piece of timber placed horizontally for supporting the roof. [Eng.]

tympan. An abbreviation of tympano or tympani.

tympan (tim'pan), n. [Formerly also timpan, timpan; < F. tympan = Sp. timpano = Pg. timpano, timpano = It. timpano = Ir. Gael. tiompan = W. tympan, a drum, timbrel, etc., < L. tympanum, < Gr. τύμπανον, poet. also τύπανον, a drum, roller, area of a pediment, panel of a door, etc., < τύπτειν, beat, strike: see type. From the same source are tympanum, *timber*³, *timbre*³, etc.] 1.

A timbrel or drum. Barley.—2. An ancient Irish musical instrument, the exact nature of which is disputed. Probably it had strings, and was played with a bow, thus resembling the crowd.

It should be remarked that the [Irish] tympan was not a drum, as was formerly supposed, but a stringed instrument, and by the researches of the antiquary O'Curry it is proved to have been played with a bow.

Sir R. P. Stewart, in Grove's Dict. Music, II. 20.

3. A stretched membrane, or a tense sheet of some thin material, as that of a drumhead.

This [carbon] lozenge is pressed gently by a tympan.

Greer, Dict. Electricity, v. 170.

4. In a printing-press having a platen, a framed appliance interposed between the platen and the sheet to be printed, for softening and equalizing the pressure, by means of blankets between its two parts, the outer and the inner tympan. The latter has a frame fitting snugly into that of the former, and both are tightly covered with parchment or strong linen cloth. In a hand-press the tympan is hinged to the outer end of the bed, has the frisket fixed by hinges to its top, receives the sheets to be printed, and completely covers the bed when folded down upon it, the platen, when lowered, fitting into the frame of the inner tympan. See cut under printing-press.

5. In anat., a tympanum.—6. In arch., a tympanum.—Tympan of an arch, a spandrel. [Rare.]

tympana, n. Latin plural of tympanum.

tympanal (tim'pan-al), a. [Gr. τύμπανον, a drum, + -al.] Same as tympanic.

tympani, n. Plural of tympano.

tympanic (tim-pan'ik), a. and n. [Gr. τύμπανον, a drum, + -ic.] 1. a. 1. Of, pertaining to, or resembling a tympan or tympanum; similar to or acting like a drumhead.—2. In anat., of or pertaining to the tympanum: as, the tympanic cavity.

The "tympanic wing" of the exoccipital [cartilage in birds].

callous pads or cushions on the under side of the toes. Such balls of the toes are little apparent or inconsistent in birds with soft skinny feet, but well marked in most perches whose toes are horny, and especially prominent in birds of prey.

tylet. An old spelling of *tyel*¹, *tyel*².

tyleberry (tī'ber'i), n. The coral-plant, Jatropha mollissima. Its seeds have properties like those of the physic-nut (see Jatropha), and it is sometimes called French physic-nut.

the tympanum, and connected with the malleus in a mammal or with the quadrate bone in a bird. It is very superficial in the human infant, where the tympanic bone is merely annular, and in those animals in which this bone is rudimentary or wanting; but it is generally situated at the bottom of a deep tube. See cuts under tympanum and earl.—Tympanic nerve, a branch of the glossopharyngeal, which enters the tympanum through a canal of the temporal bone to supply the mucous membrane of that cavity and of the Eustachian tube. Also called Jacobson's and Andersson's nerve.—Tympanic notch. See notch.—Tympanic pedicle, the suspensorium of the lower jaw in fishes. See epitympanic.—Tympanic plate, the lamina of bone which forms the anterior wall of the tympanum and external auditory meatus, and the posterior part of the glenoid fossa.—Tympanic plexus. See plexus.—Tympanic resonance, tympanic resonance (which see, under resonance).—Tympanic ring, an annular tympanic bone or cartilage, to which the tympanic membrane is attached. This bone of the ear may be a permanent complete ring, or may form an incomplete circle. In either case, it may characterize only the embryo or the infant, and grow into a tubular form, or may be inflated as a tympanic bulla, sometimes of enormous dimensions. In man the ring is at first simply annular and incomplete, so that the ossicles of the tympanum are readily seen from the outside of the skull of the infant; it acquires with age a tubular form, and becomes ankylosed with other elements of the temporal bone.

II. n. 1. A bone of the ear of man and mammals, supporting the tympanic membrane, generally annular or tubular, forming most of the meatus auditorius externus, or external auditory passage. Its outer extremity is known in human anatomy as the external auditory process; it is annular at birth, subsequently becoming elongated and cylindrical. 2. Below mammals, in animals in which the true tympanic is rudimentary or wanting, the quadrate or pedicellate bone, the representative of the malleus; the suspensorium of the lower jaw, or especially its uppermost piece, the hyomandibular or epitympanic: so called by some who suppose it to be the tympanic bone, from the fact that it in part supports the tympanic membrane. See quadrate, n., 3 (a), hyomandibular, epitympanic, and other compounds of tympanic there cited.—3. In ornith., sometimes, the tympano-occipital, considered as the true representative in birds of the tympanic of a mammal.

tympanichord (tim'pa-ni-kôrd), n. [< NL. tympanum + Gr. χορδή, a string.] That branch of the facial nerve which traverses the tympanum; the so-called chorda tympani. See chorda. Cuvier, 1837.

tympanichordal (tim'pa-ni-kôr-dal), a. [< tympanichord + -al.] Of or pertaining to the tympanichord. Cuvier.

tympaniform (tim'pa-ni-fôrm), a. [< NL. tympanum + L. forma, form.] Resembling or having the form of a tympanum; stretched like a drumhead: as, a tympaniform membrane. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 378.

tympanism (tim'pa-nizm), n. [< Gr. τύπανον, a drum, + -ism.] In pathol., distention by gas.

tympanist (tim'pa-nist), n. [< Gr. τύπανον, a drum, + -ist.] One who plays a tympan or drum. [Rare.]

"Why is the Timpan called Timpan Naimh (or saint's Timpan), and yet no saint ever took a Timpan into his hands?" "I do not know," said the tympanist. O'Curry, Arch. Irish, II. xxxi.

Tympanistria (tim-pa-nis'tri-ä), n. [NL. (Reichenbach, 1852), < Gr. τυμπανίστρια, fem. of τυμπανιστής, a drummer, < τύπανον, a drum: see tympanum.] 1. In ornith., a monotypic genus of South African doves. T. bicolor, the tambourine, is credited with a peculiar resonance of voice or sort of

2. In entom., a genus of hemipterous insects. Stål, 1861.

tympanites (tim-pa-ni'téz), n. [NL., < L. tympanites, dropsy of the belly, < Gr. τυμπανίτης, of or pertaining to a drum, < τύπανον, a drum: see tympanum.] Distention of the abdomen caused by the presence of air either in the intestine or in the cavity of the peritoneum; abdominal tympanism.—Uterine tympanites, tympanism of the womb; physometra.

tympanitic (tim-pa-ni'tik), a. [< L. tympaniticus, one who is afflicted with tympanites, < tympanites, tympanites: see tympanites.] Pertaining to or of the nature of tympanites.

Since then all he had eaten or drunk or done had flown to his stomach, producing a tympanitic action in that organ. H. Kingsley, Ravenshoe, xii.

Tympanitic dullness, the quality of a percussion-note in which the resonance is subnormal and in which the vesicular quality is absent.—Tympanitic resonance. See resonance.

tympanitis (tim-pa-ni'tis), n. [NL., < tympanum + -itis. Cf. tympanites.] 1. Inflammation of the lining membrane of the tympanum, or middle ear.—2. Incorrectly, tympanites.

tympanize (tim'pa-niz), v. [< Gr. τυμπανίζειν, beat the drum, < τύπανον, a drum: see tympanum.] 1. trans. To make into a drum. Oley, Life of G. Herbert (1871), M. 2. b. (Latham.) II. intrans. To act the part of a drummer.

tympano, n. See timpano.

tympano-Eustachian (tim'pa-nô-ü-stä'ki-an), a. Of or pertaining to the tympanum and the Eustachian tube.

tympanohyal (tim'pa-nô-hi'al), n. and a. [< tympanum + hyaloid + -al.] 1. n. In zool. and anat., a small cartilage or bone of man and some other mammals, recognizably distinct at an early period, subsequently fused with its surroundings, constituting one of the elements of Visceral Arches of Chondrocranium of Human Fetus at third month, somewhat diagrammatic, enlarged.

1. preoral (palatopterygoid) arch; 2. first postoral (mandibular) arch; 3. second postoral (hyoidean) arch; IP, internal pterygoid cartilage; EC, Eustachian cartilage; AL, anterior ligament of malleus; M, malleus; In, incus; IL, long internal lateral ligament of lower jaw, connecting the malleus with the mandible (of which latter co is the coronoid process, cd the condyle, and an the angle); bh, basihyal; th, thyrohyal; ch, ceratohyal; SH, stylohyoid ligament, suspending the hyoid to SP, stylohyal, or so-called styloid process of the temporal bone, at the root of which, in line with the incus, is TH, the tympanohyal. (From the Proceedings of the Zoological Society of London, 1884, p. 572.)

the compound temporal bone, and in man situated at the root of the styloid process, in the course of the hyoidean arch.

II. a. Specifying this cartilage or bone.

tympanomalleal (tim'pa-nô-mal'é-al), a. Pertaining to the tympanic bone and the malleus: specifying a bone in the batrachian skull, later identified as the quadratojugal. See cuts under Rana and temporomastoid.

tympanomandibular (tim'pa-nô-man-dib'ü-lär), a. Of or pertaining to the tympanum, or tympanic bone, and the mandible, or lower jaw-bone, of some animals, as fishes: specifying one of the visceral arches of the head. See epitympanic, n., and tympanic, n., 2.

tympano-occipital (tim'pa-nô-ok-sip'i-tal), n. In ornith., a small bone, or slight ossification, in relation with the exoccipital bone and the outer ear of a bird, bounding the external orifice of the ear posteriorly, and considered to represent the true tympanic bone of a mammal.

tympanoperiotic (tim'pa-nô-per-i-ot'ik), a. and n. 1. a. Including or consisting of a tympanic bone united with the periotic bone proper: used especially with reference to the ear-bone of cetaceans. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 345.

II. n. A part of the skull of cetaceans, the so-called ear-bone of those animals, which consists of the periotic bones united with one another and with the tympanic, forming a single specially hard and durable bone readily detached from the rest of the skull.

tympanosquamosal (tim'pa-nô-skwa-mô'sa), a. Common to the tympanic and the squamosal bone, as a suture or ankylosis: as, the Glaserian fissure of man is tympanosquamosal.

tympanous (tim'pa-nus), a. [Formerly also tympanous; < tympan + -ous.] Swelled or puffed out; inflated; distended; figuratively, pompous.

His proud tympanous master, swell'd with state—Middleton, Game at Chess.

tympanum (tim'pa-num), n.; pl. tympana (-nä), sometimes tympanums (-numz). [NL. < L. tympanum, < Gr. τύπανον, a drum, roll, area of a pediment, panel of a door: see tympan.] 1. An ancient tambourine or hand-drum either with a single head like the modern tambourine, or with both front and back cover (the back sometimes swelled out as in a kettle-drum), and beaten either with the hand or with a stick.—2. In anat. and zool.: (a) T ear-drum considered as to its walls, its cavity and its contents. In man and other mammals the tympanum is the middle ear, a hollow or recess in the Tympanum of Human Ear.—The tympanic cavity, enlarged, is viewed from the inside: the circular object is the tympanic membrane or membrane of the ear-drum, upon which rests Mall, the malleus; Inc, the incus; St, the stapes; ab, the horizontal axis about which the malleus and incus turn slightly; MC, cells in the mastoid part of the temporal.

temporal bone, among several of the bones of which the temporal is composed, shut off from the meatus auditorius externus by the tympanic membrane, communicating with the back of the mouth by the Eustachian tube, in relation with the labyrinth, or inner ear, its inner wall forming part of the wall of the latter, and containing a chain of little bones called ossicula auditus, and usual the chorda tympani nerve. It is a part of the passageway which in the early embryo is uninterrupted between the pharynx and the exterior, and in the adult is occluded only by the membrane of the tympanum. In the d state of the parts, the bony walls of the human tympanum present several openings: that leading outward through the external auditory meatus; the orifice of the Eustachian tube; the openings of mastoid cells; the fenestra ovalis and fenestra rotunda, respectively the communications of the scala vestibuli and scala tympani, communicating with the vestibule and cochlea of the inner ear; the iter posterius, by which the chorda tympani nerve enters the tympanum from the aqueduct of Fallopian; the iter anterior, by which the same nerve leaves the tympanum by the canal of Huguier; the canal for the tensor tympani muscle; the Glaserian fissure, between the squamosal and the tympanic bones, for the laxator tympani muscle, tympanic artery, and slender process of the malleus, these last two openings being rifts between component bones of the parts communicating, like the Eustachian tube, with parts outside the temporal bone, and the minute orifice at the apex of the pyramid, for the passage of the stapedius muscle. In animals below mammals, as birds and reptiles, the tympanum contains the columella, when that bone exists, and is the cavity of the external ear when there is no external auditory meatus. Its membrane is often upon the surface of the head, and in some cases is a conspicuous structure of the exterior, as in a frog or toad. This is well shown in the cut under parotid, where the circular formation just in front of the parotid is the tympanum. See also cut under earl and temporal. (b) The tympanic membrane; the ear-drum, in the restricted sense of that term: so used in physiology and anatomy, surgery, and in common speech: as, a rupture of the tympanum. See tympanic membrane, under tympanic. (c) In ornith.: (1) The labyrinth at the bottom of the windpipe of sundry birds, as the mergansers and various sea-ducks: a large irregular bony or gristly dilatation of the lower part of the trachea, often involving also more or less of the upper ends of the bronchi. It is chiefly found in most developed, in the male sex. (2) The naked inflatable air-sac on each side of the neck of certain birds, as grouse, especially the sage-grouse and prairie-hen, in which the ordinary cervical air-cells of birds are indistinctly developed and susceptible of great distention. See cut under Cupidonia. (d) In entom., a tympanic membrane, stretched upon a chitinated ring, one surface being directed to the exterior, the other to the interior, in relation with a tracheal vesicle and with nervous ganglia and nervous end-organs in the form of

b) The die or drum of a pedestal. See cuts under dado and pedestal. (c) The panel of a door.

—4. (a) In hydraul. engin., a water-raising current-wheel, originally made in the form of a run, whence the name. It is now a circular open-work wheel, fitted with radial partitions so curved as to point upward on the rising side of the wheel and downward on the descending side. The wheel is suspended so at its lower edge is just submerged, and is turned by a current (or by other power), the partitions scooping up quantity of water which, as the wheel revolves, runs out to the axis of the wheel, where it is discharged; or may discharge at some point of the periphery. While one of the most ancient forms of water-lifting machines, it is still used in drainage-works, though for small lifts, it is now superseded by the scoop-wheel. E. H. Knight.

b) A kind of hollow tread-wheel wherein two or more persons walk in order to turn it, and give motive motion to a machine.—5. In bot., a membranous substance stretched across the face of a moss.—Laxator tympani. See laxator.

Formerly also tympany; < OF. tympanie = Sp. timpano = Pg. timpano = It. timpano, < Gr. τύμπανον, a kind of dropsy in which the belly is stretched like a drum, < τύμπανον, a drum: see tympan, and cf. tympanites.] 1. A swelling out or inflation; an inflated or puffed-up mass or condition; hence, turgidity; bombast; conceit. [Archaic.]

The idle tympanies of a windy brain. Randolph, Muses' Looking-Glass, iv. 4.

In pathol., an inflated or distended condition of the abdomen or peritoneum; tympanites.

She cured her of three tympanies, but the fourth carried her off. Farquhar, Beaux' Stratagem, I. 1.

mp-plate (tim'plāt), n. A cast-iron support for a tympano-stone, built into the masonry of a furnace. The dam-plate forms a similar facing and support for the dam-stone. Both tympano-plate (or tympano) and dam-plate are kept cool by the circulation of water in a hollow coil about them. See tympan.

tympano-stone (tim'pōn'stōn), n. A heavy block of stone which forms the upper part of the front side of the hearth or crucible of a furnace, the lower part being inclosed by the dam-stone. See tympan.

tynd†, n. A spelling of tind†.

Tyndarides (tin-dar'i-dē), n. pl. [L., pl. of Tyndarides, < Gr. Τυνδαρίδης, a descendant of Tyndareus, < Τυνδάρεος, Tyndareos, a mythical king of Sparta, husband of Leda, and father of Castor and Pollux.] The male children of Tyndareus—Castor and Pollux: a name applied to the electric discharge commonly known as St. Elmo's fire. See corpusant.

tyne. See time, time†, etc.

Tynwald, Tinewald (tin'wōld), n. [Also Tynwald; a var. of the word which appears in a more original form in the Shetland tingwall, < Icel. thing-völlr, the place where a parliament sat, < thing, a parliament, assembly, & völlr (= AS. weald), a wood: see thing† and wold†.] The parliament or legislature of the Isle of Man, consisting of the governor and council, constituting the upper house, and the House of Keys, or lower house. It is independent of the British Parliament, its acts requiring only the assent of the sovereign in council.

tynsent†, n. Same as tinsel†.

B. V. Head, Historia Numorum, Int., p. lii.

2. Something that has a representative or symbolical significance; an emblem, or an emblematic instance.

Some of our readers may have seen in India a cloud of crows pecking a sick vulture to death—no bad type of what happens in that country as often as fortunate deserts one who has been great and dreaded.

Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

3. Specifically, a prefigurement; a foreshadowing of, or that which foreshows, some reality to come, which is called the antitype; particularly, in theol., a person, thing, or event in the Old Testament regarded as foreshowing or betokening a corresponding reality of the new dispensation; a prophetic similitude: as, the paschal lamb is the type of Christ (who is the antitype).

The nature of types is in shadow to describe by dark lines a future substance. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 115.

As he sees his Day at a distance through Types and Shadows, he rejoices in it. Addison, Spectator, No. 369.

4. A characteristic embodiment; a definitive example or standard; an exemplar; a pattern; a model.

Aristophanes is beyond question the highest type of pure comedy. Lovell, Study Windows, p. 218.

5. A representative style, mode, or structure; a characteristic assemblage of particulars or qualities.—6. In biol., specifically, a main division of the animal or vegetable kingdom; a sub-kingdom, branch, phylum, or province. Thus, Leuckart divided animals into the six types Caententata, Echinodermata, Vermes, Arthropoda, Mollusca, and Vertebrata (the protozoans not being treated). The vegetable kingdom is similarly divided into main groups called types of vegetation; and in general, in any department of biology, type is predicable of the structure or morphological character of a division or group of any grade in taxonomy, down to the species itself, as compared with another group of its own grade: as, a family type; a generic type. (See type genus, type species, type specimen, and unity of type, below.) The term has both a concrete or material sense, in its application to actually embodied form, and an ideal sense, as applied to form in the abstract. See archetype, prototype, antitype.

Natural Groups are best described, not by any definition which marks their boundaries, but by a Type which marks their centre. The Type of any natural group is an example which possesses in a marked degree all the leading characters of the class.

Howell, Philos. of Inductive Sciences, I. p. xxiii.

The whole animal kingdom can be broken up into several large divisions, each of which differs from the rest by a number of special characteristics. The essential character may be recognized in all the subdivisions, and even under great individual variations. This has been called the type. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 64.

7. A model or style that serves as a guide; a general plan or standard for the doing of anything; especially, in the arts, the plan, idea, or conception upon which anything is modeled or according to which any work is executed.—8. A right-angled prism-shaped piece of metal or wood, having for its face a letter or character (usually in high relief), adapted for use in letterpress printing; collectively, the assemblage of the stamped characters used for printing; types in the aggregate. Types of wood are of large size, and are now used only for posting-bills. Types for books or newspapers are of founded metal. (See type-metal, matrix, and mold†.) In Great Britain the standard height of type is .9166 inch; in the United States it is variable, from .9166 to .9188 inch. French and German types are higher. The features of type are face, counter, stem (chief stroke, or body-mark), hair-line, serif, neck or beard, shoulder, body or shank, pin-mark, neck, feet, groove. (See cut below.) The names of printing-types, given in an increasing scale as to size, are exzelior, brilliant, diamond, pearl, agate or ruby, nonpareil (the type in which this is printed), emerald or minionette, minion, brevier (the larger size of type used throughout this dictionary), bourgeois, long primer, small pica, pica, English, two-line, brevier, great primer, paragon, double small pica, double pica, double English, double great primer, meridian or trifolgar, and canon. All sizes larger than canon are named by the regular multiples of pica, as five-line pica, six-line pica. The smaller sizes are or should be graded so that each size will be doubled in its seventh progression. (See point†, 14 (b).) The names here given define the dimensions of the bodies only. The faces or styles of types most used are the roman and italic, which form the text of all books in English. Antique, gothic, clarendon, and black-letter are approved styles for display. The type for headings of entries in this dictionary and for phrase-headings is antique condensed. Ornamental types are too irregular for classification. Of each style many varieties are made, which are usually labeled with a special name. Roman types are broadly divided into two classes, modern and old-style. The leading forms of modern roman are broad-face, Scotch-face, French-face, thin-face, bold-face. Old-style types are reproductions of the styles of early printers: the Caalon and the Baskerville (English styles), of the eighteenth century; the French and the Elzevir, of the seventeenth century; and the Baale, or early Italian, of the sixteenth century. The shapes of types as to width are defined by the following names: up to standard is a type of which the lower-case alphabet measures 12 ems or squares of its own body from bourgeois to pica, or more than 12 ems for the smaller sizes (on newspapers the standards for widths of types range from 14 to 17 ems for the alphabet); lean or lean-faced type is a name applied to types slightly below the standard; condensed type is seriously below the standard (see condensed); extra-condensed and elongated are of unusual thinness; fat letter or fat-faced is slightly wider than the standard; expanded is still wider; extended is of unusual breadth. The Roman types for book- and newspaper-work are in three series: capitals or upper-case, A, B, C, D; small capitals, A, B, C, D; lower-case, a, b, c, d, sometimes called small letters, or minuscules. A two-line type is a capital of the face height of two lines of its accompanying text. A double type is the height of two bodies of the size specified by its name. Copper-faced type is type covered on its face only with a thin coat of copper by an electrolytic bath. White-faced type or bar-faced type is type uncovered; so called to distinguish it from the coppered, or to specify type that is new and that has never been covered with ink. Nickel-plated type is type plated on its face with nickel. Bastard type is a type with a face too large or too small for its body. Type-high is of the standard height of type. Type high to paper is above the standard of height. High-bodied type is a type with too high shoulders. American type-founders apportion the characters of a font, or complete collection of characters, by weight. In a font of 1,000 pounds there are of roman lower-case 514 pounds; capitals, 86; small capitals, 20; figures, 40; points, 28; spaces, 35; quatrains, 12; fractions, 5; italic lower-case, 73; italic capitals, 23; sundries, 4—total, 1,000 pounds. 9. In numis., the principal device or subject on the obverse and reverse of a coin or medal. For example, on sovereigns of Queen Victoria the head of the queen is the obverse type and the group of St. George and the Dragon the reverse type.

10. In chem., a fundamental chemical compound which represents the structure of a large number of other and more complex compounds.

Hydrochloric acid (HCl), water (H₂O), ammonia (NH₃), and marsh-gas (CH₄) are the four types, or typical compounds, which have been most employed.

11. [cap.] In church hist., an edict of the emperor Constant II., issued in 648. The Type (superceding the Euthesia) forbade all discussion of the question whether there are in Christ two wills and two operations or energies, or only one will and one operation.

12. In math., a succession of symbols susceptible of + and — signs. — Checker-type. See checker. — Chess-type. See chess. — Chromatic, compressed, elastic type. See the adjectives. — Elizabethan type. Same as church text (which see, under church). — Grade of a type, in alg. See grade. — Monadelphic type. See monadelphic. — Rubber type. See rubber. — Test types. See test. — Type genus, in biol., a generic type; the genus which is typical of the family or other higher group to which it belongs, or which is formally taken and held to be. It may be the only representative of such more comprehensive group, or one of several generic components of the higher group. In the actual technic of classification and nomenclature the name-giving genus of a family or subfamily is regularly assumed to be the type, though it may not be in fact the truest or best representative of the group thus indicated. — Type of a reciprocal. See reciprocal. — Type of a stress or strain. the character of the stress or strain as defined by the stress-ellipsoid or strain-ellipsoid. — Type of a wave. the relation between the extent of disturbance at a given instant of a set of particles and their respective undisturbed positions. — Type of Desor. a nemertean worm which does not pass through a piliid stage, or the type of structure characterizing such a nemertean. — Type species, in biol., a specific type; that species of a genus which is regarded as the best example of the generic characters, and especially that species upon which a genus has been nominally or ostensibly based; the type of a genus. The determination of the type species is always a matter of much practical concern in the nomenclature of zoology and botany, since upon it turns the assignation of generic names, and consequently the major term in the binomial designation of every species. It is often difficult and sometimes impossible to make this determination, so intricate has become the synonymy of many species, and so far from being actually typical of a genus is the species assumed to be its type in many cases. (See synonymy.) It is now the rule (neglect of which is a decided breach of nomenclatorial propriety) for the author who names a new genus to declare his type species; and such declaration of the basis of his genus is conclusive of his intent, however well or ill he may proceed to characterize his genus. But no such custom prevailed with the earlier naturalists, whose genera we have consequently to take either (a) upon the face of the generic diagnosis originally made, or (b) upon the specific contents — that is, upon the species actually grouped under the generic name. Nearly all the older genera were made more comprehensive than modern genera are allowed to be, and have been restricted by reference of nearly all (often of all but one) of their usually numerous species to other genera; yet a generic name once established upon any species must always rest upon some (one or more) species; hence the occasion and the necessity for the determination of the type species in every such case. This has been done mainly in three ways. (1) The first species given by an author in the list of the species of his genus is arbitrarily assumed to be the type species. This is a mere convention, which often becomes an absurdity. (2) The species which agrees best with the author's diagnosis of his genus is selected as the type species. This is reasonable, but it is at best a matter of opinion, and opinions differ enough to unsettle the whole system of nomenclature if each is to be allowed its own full weight. (3) The most feasible and only safe procedure is to consider that species to be the type species which has as a matter of fact been left in the original genus from which the other species have been successively detached to form new genera; or, if there be more than one left, to choose the best-known, the being almost always the one which has often borne the original generic name, and hence is most closely identified with it. For example: Let there be a Linnean genus Aba, with 3 species, A. aca, A. ada, and A. aga; let A. ada and A. aga have been detached as types respectively of two new genera; then A. aca remains as the type species of the original genus Aba, in its now restricted sense. This rule is applicable with force and precision to thousands of questionable cases; and its observance, together with insistence upon the fundamental law of priority, tends to the utmost attainable fixity of zoological and botanical nomenclature. — Type specimen, in biol., an individual animal or plant, or any part of one, prepared and preserved as a specimen of natural history, from which the description of a species has been prepared and upon which a specific name has been based; the actual object which serves as the type of a species in zoology or botany. In theoretic strictness every type specimen is unique; practically, a species may be based upon several or many specimens which answer exactly to the diagnosis made, or typify different phases of the species, as male and female specimens of the same animal, flowering and fruiting specimens of the same plant, and so on. Type specimens have a particular part and high value in descriptive zoology and botany, comparable to that of the actual object which is taken as the authoritative standard in any system of weights, measures, or coinage. When available for examination, they take precedence over any published description or figure, and are conclusive evidence in cases of doubtful or disputed specific identity. — Unity of type, in biol., that fundamental agreement in structure which we see in organic beings of the same class, order, etc., and which is independent of their habits of life, and consequently unaffected by adaptive modifications.

On my theory, unity of type is explained by unity of descent. Darwin, Origin of Species, vi.

type-bar (tip'bär), n. 1. A line of types in form of one solid bar, cast during the process of composition in some type-setting machine. — 2. In some type-writers, a short bar of iron having at its extremity one of the steel types which serve to make the impressions.

type-block (tip'blok), n. A body of metal or wood on which a character used as a type is cut or cast.

type-case (tip'käs), n. See case, 6.

type-casting (tip'käs'ting), n. The act or process of founding type in molds. It was formerly done by hand, now chiefly by machinery.

Type-casting and -setting machine, a machine which collects over a mold the matrices that are needed by the operator, and fills this mold with melted metal, either the form of a single type or of a full line of types. — Type casting machine, a mechanism which casts or founds type, but does not rub or dress them. A complete type-casting machine is a mechanism which founds, rubs, dresses, and sets up in lines perfect types.

type-chart (tip'chärt), n. In biol., a chart exhibiting the details of a typical form or structure; a chart of a type. [Rare.]

There are type-charts of each organ, . . . so that the is not the least difficulty in tracing the homologies structure throughout the whole vertebrate kingdom. Nineteenth Century, XXI. 38 type-cutter (tip'kut'er), n. A punch-cutting machine, one who engraves dies for printing-types; die-sinker employed in a type-foundry.

He was a die-sinker and type-cutter with a nebulous and questionable record. Athenaeum, No. 3253, p. 23 type-cutting (tip'kut'ing), n. The engraving of a type or a type-die; usually called punch-cutting. See punch, 6.

type-cylinder (tip'sil'in-dër), n. The cylinder of a rotary printing-machine on which type or plates are fastened for printing. See cylinder, under printing-machine.

type-dressing (tip'dres'ing), n. The process of cutting off with suitable knives or planes the superfluous metal on newly cast types. — Type dressing machine, a mechanism which removes the burrs or feather-edges from the angles of recently cast types, and cuts off all superfluous metal.

type-founder (tip'foun'dër), n. A manufacturer of type by founding or molding. Also called letter-founder.

type-founding (tip'foun'ding), n. The art or process of manufacturing movable metallic types used by printers. It includes punch-cutting, mold-making, and type-casting, by hand or by machine. Also called letter-founding.

type-foundry (tip'foun'dri), n. A place where printing-types are manufactured. Also called letter-foundry.

type-gage (tip'gāj), n. A mechanism used by type-founders to test the accuracy of type. It consists of an exact right-angled flat bar of steel, against which can be moved another flat bar slightly out of parallelism with its mate. The sides of the bars are graduated in standard lines. A type too thin or too thick when placed between these bars shows its deviation from the standard.

type-high (tip'hi), a. Of the height of type, noting a woodcut or blocked electrotype plate. — Type-high clump, a square block of type-metal made of various sizes to uphold to a proper height stereotypic plates in the process of printing. [Eng.] type-holder (tip'höl'dër), n. A pallet or receptacle for holding type, used by bookbinders and for hand-stamping.

type-matrix (tip'mä'triks), n. See matrix, 2 (d). typembryo (ti-emp'brî-6), n. [NL., < Gr. τύπος, type, + ἐμβρυον, embryo.] That stage or period in the development of an embryo when the characteristics of the main type to which it belongs are first discoverable; an embryo advanced to the stage when it shows the type of structure of the phylum or subkingdom to which it belongs. The term was lately introduced by A. Hyatt with special reference to the embryology of mollusks. Hyatt considered the typembryo of a mollusk to be the veliger stage, when the embryo is far enough advanced to be recognized as molluscan; he also applied the term to the completed embryonic shell, or protoconch (which see). Later (July, 1890) E. T. Jackson used typembryo in a more restricted and precise sense, as the first of the following recognizable embryonic stages of mollusks: (1) proembryo, prior to blastulation; (2) mesembryo, the blastula; (3) metembryo, the gastrula; (4) neembryo, the trochophore (which see); (5) typembryo, the period when the essential molluscan feature, the shell-gland, and plate-like beginnings of the shell are discoverable, yet in which the embryo is not far enough advanced to show to what class it belongs; (6) the phylembryo, or that early veliger stage (see veliger, with cut) in which the structure of the shell and other characters render the embryo referable to the class of mollusks to which it belongs.

type-measure (tip'mezh'ūr), n. Same as type-measure.

type-measurer (tip'mezh'ūr-ēr), n. In printing, a graduated rod on the sides or edges of which the body of each different size of type is marked. In use it is laid alongside a column of matter or proof, to ascertain the number of lines and the number of ems.

type-metal (tip'met'al), n. An alloy of lead with antimony, or with tin and antimony, used to make types for printing. The value of the alloy is considerably increased by the addition of a small amount of tin (from 6 to 8 per cent.). Copper and iron have also been used in small quantity to give greater resistance to the alloy. The proportions of the metals used vary considerably with the quality desired, and in different type-foundries. The metal used in some foundries for small types, from brilliant to brevier, consists of 100 pounds of lead, 40 pounds of antimony, and 20 pounds of tin; while larger types, from bourgeois to pica, are cast from 100 pounds of lead, 30 pounds of antimony, and 15 pounds of tin. Extra hard or copper-alloy metal contains 100 pounds of lead, 44 pounds of antimony, 24 pounds of tin, and 1 per cent. of copper. Electrotype metal contains 100 pounds of lead, 4 pounds of antimony, and 5 pounds of tin. Stereotype metal contains 100 pounds of lead, 20 pounds of antimony, and 16 pounds of tin. Soft metal, such as is used for leads and quadrats, contains a very large proportion of lead, and but little tin and antimony.

type-mold (tip'möld), n. See mold, 3.

type-punch (tip'punch), n. See punch, 6.

type-scale (tip'skal), n. A measuring-rod of stout paper, ivory, or thin brass, which shows the dimensions of the most-used bodies of type. It is used to measure composed types.

type-setter (tip'set'er), n. 1. A composer of types; a compositor. — 2. A type-setting machine. See type-setting.

type-setting (tip'set'ing), n. The act or process of setting or combining types in proper order for printing. It is usually done by picking up each type from an exposed case, and arranging the types as collected in a composing-stick in lines of even length. — type-setting machine, a mechanism intended to quicken the operation of type-setting. In the simpler forms of mechanical type-setters, the types, separately arranged in inclined tubes or channels, are successively dislodged by the pressure of appropriate levers moved by the fingers of the operator on a keyboard. As the types fall, they are collected in a long line, and afterward subdivided in lines of proper length. The Kastenbein and McMillen machines are of this construction. Distribution of types is usually done by a separate machine, of which there are many varieties. In all, each distinct letter or character is provided with its own special nick, which serves the ston casts single types by the pressure of the finger on a keyboard, and arranges the cast types in lines for printing. The first type-setting and type-making machine was planned at London by Dr. Church in 1824. More than fifty varieties of machine type-setters have been invented, but few are in use.

type-wheel (tip'hwël), n. A disk or revolving sector bearing letters in relief on its periphery; used in some adaptations of the telegraph and in some type-writers.

type-write (tip'rit), v. t. and i. To print or reproduce by means of a type-writer; practise type-writing. [Recent.]

type-writer (tip'rit'er), n. 1. A machine for mechanical writing, operated by hand, and printing one letter, or combination of letters, at a time, by the impress of type adapted to the purpose. There are now several distinct types of these machines. — 2. An operator on a type-writing machine; one who prints characters on paper by means of a type-writer. — Automatic type-writer telegraph. See telegraph.

type-writing (tip'rit'ing), n. The process of printing letter by letter by the use of a type-writer; also, work done by this process.

Typha (ti'fä), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700; earlier by Lobel, 1576), < Gr. τύφη, cattail.] A genus of plants, type of the order Typhaceæ. It is distinguished from Spartanum, the other genus of the family, by its linear anthers, stalked ovary, and dry indehiscent fruit. There are 13 species, natives of freshwater swamps in both tropical and temperate regions. They are smooth herbs with strong creeping rootstocks from which grow erect, unbranched and often tall and robust stems with a submerged base. The leaves are chiefly radical, long and linear, spongy, and at first somewhat fleshy and watery. The monocous flowers form a cylindrical terminal spadix, the upper part of which is staminate and deciduous; both parts are partly covered in the bud by very perishable thin spatheaceous bracts. The long-stalked minute fruit is produced in great abundance, over 60,000 to the average spike in the common species; each fruit contains a single seed, and is surrounded near the base by twenty to forty long slender white hairs which expand at maturity, aiding in dispersion by the wind. The plant usually reaches from 5 to 9 feet high; in California T. Domingensis sometimes reaches 18 feet, including an inflorescence of 3 feet; in the common T. latifolia the handsome dark rusty-brown fertile part of the spike is usually from 5 to 8 inches long, sometimes 14, and is much used for rustic decoration. The abundant mealy pollen is made into bread in India and New Zealand; it is inflammable, and has been used as a substitute for tinder and for matches. The powdered flowers have been used for poultices, and the farinaceous rootstocks are considered astringent and diuretic in eastern Asia. The long leaves are much used in central New York to make chair-bottoms, and are elsewhere woven into mats and baskets. Three species occur in the United States, of which T. latifolia, with four-grained pollen, and T. angustifolia, with single-grained pollen, are widely distributed throughout the northern parts of both hemispheres; the latter is in the United States more local and largely maritime, and often shows a distinct interval between the male and female divisions of the spike. The other and larger species, T. Domingensis, occurs in the West Indies, Mexico, Texas, California, and the Argentine Republic. For T. elephantina, see elephant-grass; for the others, cattail, reed-mace, and verve; and compare marsh-bettle and dunche-donny. They are also commonly known as flag and as bulrush.

Cattail (Typha latifolia).
a, the spadix, with male flowers above and female ones below; b, a male flower; c, a female flower.

Thorne Type-setting Machine.

a, distributing-cylinder; b, setting-cylinder; c, mechanism actuating distributing cylinder; d, driving mechanism actuating type-carrying disk; carrying-belt, packer, keyboard, levers, etc.; e, shaft, which transmits the power to all parts excepting the distributing-cylinder; f, type-carrying disk; g, packer, which lifts the type singly from the composing line; h, keyboard; i, levers, connecting keyboard with type-carrying disk; j, copy-holder; k, justifying mechanism; l, iron case for spaces and hyphens; m, type-bank, containing types, which are inserted by hand as required; n, case for small capitals in some machines for fractions and other odd characters, to be set by hand.

same purpose as the nicks or channels in a key for the words of its look. When the types are successively presented before outlets with wands, the proper nick finds its proper ward, and is discharged in its proper channel. Some machines combine the two operations of setting and distribution, as the Thorne and Paige machines. The Paige machine adds the operation of automatic justifying, or making its lines of even length. A more complex form of machine dispenses with types and distribution, and makes the types as they are needed. The operator at the keyboard moves levers that assemble the matrices in proper order over a mold, and justifies the words of each line in a line evenly spaced and of uniform length. The mold is then instantly filled with melted type-metal, which casts all the words in one piece. The Mergenthaler, Linotype, and the Rogers are of this form. The Lantyphloenteritis (tif-lō-en-ter-i'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. τυφλός, blind, + έντερον, intestine, + -itis.] Same as typhlitis.

typhloid (tif'lō'id), a. [< Gr. τυφλός, blind, + ειδός, form.] Having defective vision, as a blindworm.

typhology (tif-lō'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. τυφλός, blind, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The sum of scientific knowledge concerning blindness.

typhlope (tif'lōp), n. [NL. Typhlops.] A small snake of the family Typhlopidae; a worm-snake or blindworm.

Typhlophthalmi (tif-lōf-thal'mi), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. τυφλός, blind, + ὀφθαλμός, eye.] In Cope's classification, a superfamily of pleurodont lizards, represented by the Anekytropidae, Acontidae, and Antellidae.

typhlophthalmic (tif-lōf-thal'mik), a. [< Typhlophthalmi + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Typhlophthalmi.

Typhlopidae (tif-lōp-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Typhlops + -idae.] A family of angiotomatous scolecophidian serpents, typified by the genus Typhlops; the worm-snakes or blindworms. It formerly included all the small serpents with the mouth not distensible and teeth only in one jaw, upper or lower, being the same as Typhlopidae. By the division of these into two families, Catodontia and Epanodontia, with lower and with upper teeth only, respectively, the Typhlopidae are restricted to the latter, and contrasted with Stenostomatidae.

Typhlopoidea (tif-lō-pōi-dē'ō), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. τυφλός, blind, + ὤψ, eye, + ειδός, form.] A suborder of Ophidia, containing the small scolecophidian or angiotomatous snakes of the families Typhlopidae and Stenostomatidae, and thus equivalent to Typhlopidae in a broad sense. They differ from all other ophidians in having no transverse bone of the skull, the pterygoid disconnected from the quadrate, the palatine with its long axis transverse and bounding the nasal choana behind, and the ethmoturbinal forming part of the roof of the mouth.

Typhlops (tif'lōps), n. [NL. (Schneider), < Gr. τυφλός, blind, + ὤψ, eye, + ειδός, form.] The typical genus of Typhlopidae, having the muzzle covered above with rostral and internasals, and one ocular, one preocular, and one nasal plate.

typhlosis (tif-lō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. τύφλωσις, a making blind, blindness, < τυφλόν, make blind, < τυφλός, blind.] Blindness.

typhlosolar (tif-lō-sō'lār), a. [< typhlosolē + -ar.] Of the character of or pertaining to a typhlosolē. Micros. Sci., N. S., XXVII. 565.

typhlosolē (tif-lō-sō'l), n. [< Gr. τυφλός, blind, + σωλήν, tube, pipe: see solen.] A thick folding of the intestine of certain annelids, mollusks, etc., formed by the involution of the wall of the intestine along the dorsomedian line, and projecting into the intestinal cavity. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 196.

Typhoean (ti-fō'ē-an), a. [Also, erroneously, Typhæan, Typhæan; < L. Typhæus, < Gr. Τυφώεις, contr. Τυφός, Typhoeus (see def.); cf. Typhon.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling Typhoeus (or Typhos), a monster of Greek mythology, who tried to conquer the gods, but was overcome by Zeus and buried under Mount Etna. Typhoeus is described as vomiting flame from a hundred mouths, and thus typifies a volcano.

typhoid (ti'foid), a. and n. [= F. typhoide, < Gr. τυφοειδής, contr. τυφώδης, delirious, of persons suffering from fever, also of the fever itself, < τύφος, smoke, also stupor arising from fever: see typhus.] I. a. Resembling typhus; noting a specific continued fever. — Bilious typhoid fever. See fever. — Typhoid bacillus, or Eberth's bacillus, a micro-organism found in the intestinal ulcers, and elsewhere in the bodies, of those dying from typhoid fever, and believed to be the cause of this disease. — Typhoid condition or state, a condition occurring sometimes in the course of acute diseases of a depressing type, in which there is marked lowering of all the vital forces, shown by prostration, muttering delirium, carphologia, muscular twitchings, unconscious discharges from the bladder and bowels, a dry, cracked, often blackish tongue, etc. — Typhoid fever. See fever. — Typhoid pneumonia. See pneumonia.

II. n. Typhoid fever. See fever.
typhoidal (ti'foid'al), a. [< typhoid + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of typhoid fever: as, typhoidal symptoms.
typhomalarial (ti'fō-mā-lā'ri-āl), a. [< typho(id) + malarial.] Involving both typhoid and malarial characters: applied to a disease caused by the combined influence of filth and the malarial poison, or a typhoid fever in which the symptoms are modified by the action of malaria. Whether either of these conditions exists has been a subject of dispute among medical writers.

typhomania (ti-fō-mā-ni-ā), n. [< Gr. τύφος, stupor (see typhus, typhoid), + μανία, madness.]

A low, muttering delirium with stupor, but without sleep, as seen in severe cases of typhus fever. Also typhomania.

typhon¹ (tí'fón), n. [< NL. typhon (Bacon), < Gr. τυφών, also τυφός, a furious whirlwind; cf. Τυφών, Typhon, one of the giants, son of Typhoeus, and Τυφός, Τυφώεις, father of Typhon, and a god of the winds; cf. τύφος, cloud, smoke, mist, < τύφειν, smoke; cf. Skt. dhūpa, smoke. Cf. typhoon, q. v.] A whirlwind.

Typhon² (tí'fón), n. [< L. Typhon, < Gr. Τυφών, one of the giants: see def. and *typhon*¹.] 1. In Gr. myth., a son of Typhoeus, and the father of the winds: later confused with Typhos or Typhoeus.—2. The Greek name of the Egyptian divinity Set, the personification of the principle of evil.—3. [l. c.] A large East Indian heron, Ardea sumatrana.

typhonia (tí-fó'ni-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. τυφός, stupor: see typhus.] Same as typhomania.

typhonic (tí-fón'ik), a. [*< typhon*¹ + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a typhon or typhoon; having the force or character of a typhoon.

typhoon (tí-fón'), n. [Formerly also tyfoon; altered, in simulation of *typhon*¹, from the earlier tufoon (1680), tufoon (1610), touffon (1567), < Pg. tufoão, < Ar. Pers. Hind. tūfān (whence in recent Anglo-Ind. tufan, toofan, toofaan, touffan), a sudden and violent storm, a tempest, hurricane. The Ar. Pers. Hind. tūfān does not appear to be original in any of those languages, and may have been derived from the Gr. τυφών, whence also E. typhon: see *typhon*¹. Cf. Chinese t'ai fūng, 'a great wind' (of any kind): ta, t'ai, great; fūng (also given as fāng, fēng), in Canton fong, wind. The term tai fūng, a cyclone, a local name in Formosa, may be from the Chinese t'ai fūng in its general sense. The Chinese names for typhoon are pao fūng, lit. 'fierce wind'; kiu fūng, lit. 'cyclone wind' (kiu, a furious cyclone, whirlwind, a wind which comes from four sides at once). The Chinese terms have prob. no connection with the Ar. Pers. Hind. word. A violent hurricane occurring in the China seas and their environs, principally during the months of July, August, September, and October. Typhoons are prolonged cyclonic storms of great intensity, and correspond in every respect to the West Indian hurricanes which occur in the same latitudes in the western hemisphere.

I went aboard of the shippe of Bengala, at which time it was the yeere of Touffon, concerning which Touffon ye are to understand, that in the East Indies often times there are not stormes as in other countreys; but every 10. or 12. yeeres there are such tempests and stormes that it is a thing incredible. . . . neither do they know certainly what yeere they will come. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 370.

Tyfoons are a particular kind of violent Storm blowing on the Coast of Tonquin. . . . It comes on fierce and blows very violent, at N. E. twelve hours more or less. . . . When the Wind begins to abate, it dies away suddenly, and falling flat calm it continues so an Hour, more or less; then the Wind comes about to the S. W., and it blows and rains as fierce from thence as it did before at N. E., and as long. Dampier, Voyages, II. 1. 239.

typhotoxin (tí-fó-tok'sin), n. [< Gr. τυφός, stupor (see typhus), + τοξ(ικόν), poison, + -in.] A toxin (C₇H₁₇NO₂) obtained from cultures of the bacillus of typhoid fever.

typhous (tí'fus), a. [< typh(us) + -ous.] Of or relating to typhus.

typh-poison (tí'poi'zn), n. [< typh(us), typh(oíd), + poison.] Poison or virus which when admitted into the system produces typh-fever, or continued low fevers, as typhus or typhoid.

typhus (tí'fus), n. [= F. typhus = Sp. tifo = Pg. typho = It. tifo = D. G. typhus = Sw. Dan. tyfus, < NL. typhus, typhus (cf. L. typhus, pride, vanity), < Gr. τυφός, smoke, vapor, mist (hence, vanity, conceit), also stupor, esp. stupor arising from fever, < τυφειν, smoke: see *typhon*¹.] A fever accompanied by great prostration, usually delirium, and an eruption of small reddish-purple spots; ship-fever; jail-fever. Compare typhus fever, under fever.—Abdominal typhus fever. See fever.—Malignant bilious typhus fever. See fever.—Surgical typhus fever, pyemia.—Typhus abdominalis, typhoid fever. See fever.—Typhus ambulatorius, walking typhoid fever.—Typhus carcerum, jail-fever.—Typhus castrensis, camp-fever. See fever.—Typhus exanthematicus, typhus fever.—Typhus fever. See def. and fever.—Typhus gangliaris, typhoid fever.—Typhus icterodes, yellow fever. See fever.—Typhus petechialis, typhus fever.—Typhus recurrens, relapsing fever.

typic (tí'pik), a. [= F. typique = Sp. típico = Pg. típico (cf. D. G. typisch = Sw. Dan. typisk), < L. typicus, < Gr. τυπικός, of or pertaining to a type, conformable, typical, < τυπος, impression, type: see type.] Constituting or representing a type; typical. [Rare.]

Thou Gracious deign'st to let the fair One view
Her Typic People.

Prior, Second Hymn of Callimachus.

Here's Smith already swearing at my feet
That I'm the typic she. Away with Smith!
Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, ix.

Typic fever, a fever that is regular in its attacks, or that follows a particular type: opposed to erratic fever.

typical (tí'pik), a. [< LL. typicālis, < L. typicus, type: see typic and -al.] 1. Having the character of a significant or symbolic type; serving as an index or a symbol of something past, present, or to come; representative; emblematic; illustrative.

The description is, as sorted best to the apprehension of those times, typicall and shadowie.

Milton, Church-Government, i. 2.
On the right hand of Popery sat Judaism, represented by an old man embroidered with phylacteries, and distinguished by many typical figures, which I had not skill enough to unriddle. Addison, Tatler, No. 257.

Typical remains of every disposition must continue traceable even to the remotest future.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 329.

2. Constituting or conforming to a type or pattern; representative in kind or quality; serving as a characteristic example of a group or an aggregate: as, a typical animal, plant, species, or genus; a typical building; typical conduct. Also typal. Compare atypical, etypical, subtypical.

I need hardly name David and Jonathan; yet I cannot pass them by; for theirs is, and will remain, the typical friendship of the world. N. A. Rev., CXIX. 455.

3. Of or pertaining to a type or types; significantly characteristic or illustrative; indicative; connotative: as, a typical example or specimen; typical markings, colors, or limbs.—Typical cells, in bot., same as fundamental cells (which see, under fundamental).

typicality (tí'pik'-i-ti), n. [< typical + -ity.] The fact or state of being typical; existence as a type or symbol; also, adherence to types or standards. [Rare.]

Such men . . . have spurned the empty typicality of the church whenever she has pretended to appease that immortal want [of a really divine righteousness]. H. James, Subs. and Shad., p. 222.

typically (tí'pik'-i), adv. In a typical manner; representatively; symbolically.

Other Levitical lambs took away sin typically, this really. Rev. T. Adams, Works, II. 113.

In the Eucharist he [Christ] still is figured . . . more clearly, but yet still but typically, or in figure.

Jer. Taylor, Dissuasive from Popery, II. ii. § 3.

typicalness (tí'pik'-nes), n. The state of being typical.

typicum (tí'pik'-um), n. [< MGr. τυπικόν, a book of ritual, an imperial decree, neut. of Gr. τυπικός, of or pertaining to a type: see typic.] In the Gr. Ch., same as directory, 1.

Typidentata (tí'pí-den-tá'tā), n. pl. [NL., < L. typus, type, + dentatus, toothed.] A division of placental mammals, containing all excepting the Edentata.

typification (tí'pí-fí-kā'shon), n. [< typify + -ic-at-ion.] The act or state of typifying.

typifier (tí'pí-fí-ēr), n. [< typify + -er.] One who or that which typifies.

A modern typifier, who deals only in similitudes and correspondences. Warburton, Works, XI. 403.

typify (tí'pí-fí), v. t.; pret. and pp. typified, ppr. typifying. [< L. typus, type, + facerē, make (see -fy).] 1. To represent by an image, form, model, or resemblance; show forth; prefigure.

Our Saviour was typified indeed by the goat that was slain. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

2. To be or constitute a type of; embody the typical characteristics of; exemplify: as, the tiger typifies all the animals of the cat kind.

typist (tí'píst), n. [< type + -ist.] One who uses a type-writer. [Recent.]

typo (tí'pō), n. [Abbr. of typographer.] A compositor. [Colloq.]

typocosmy (tí'pō-kōz-mi), n. [< Gr. τυπος, type, + κόσμος, the world.] A representation of the world; universal terminology. [Rare.]

Books of typocosmy, which have been made since; being nothing but a mass of words of all arts, to give men countenance, that those which use the terms might be thought to understand the art.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.
Typodontia (tí'pō-don'shiā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. τυπος, type, + ὀδόντις (ὀδόντ-) = E. tooth.] In Blyth's edition of Cuvier, an order of placental Mammalia, comprehending the Bimana, Quadrumania, and Carnaria (carnassiers) of Cuvier; one of two orders constituting Blyth's zoöphagous type of mammals. [Not in use.]

typo-etching (tí'pō-ech'ing), n. The process of making a plate for relief printing by etching with acid the parts of the surface of a stone which have not previously been protected. See lithography. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 704.

typo. An abbreviation of typography or typographer.

typograph (tí'pō- or tí'pō-gráf), n. [< Gr. τύπος, type, + γραφία, < γραφειν, write.] A type-making and type-setting machine. Science, VII. 252.

typographer (tí-pōg'ra-fér), n. [< typograph + -er.] 1. One who prints with or from types; or by typographic process.

There is a very ancient edition of this work [Justinian "Institutes"], without date, place, or typographer. T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, II. 381, n.

2. A beetle of the genus Bostrychus, as B. pographicus: so called from the characteristic markings its larva makes on the bark of trees.

typographic (tí-pō- or tí-pō-gráf'ik), a. [= F. typographique = Sp. tipográfico = Pg. tipografico = It. tipografico; as typograph-y + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the art of printing from types, woodcuts, or plates in high relief.—Typographic machine, a machine for impressing a matrix from which a stereotype plate may be cast. It has keys which, as they are depressed, operate types in the order desired. E. H. Knight.—Typographic point. See point, 14 (b).

typographical (tí-pō- or tí-pō-gráf'ik-ál), a. [< typographic + -al.] 1. Of or pertaining to typography, or the use or manipulation of type for printing: as, typographical errors.—2t. Emblematic; figurative; typical.

typographically (tí-pō- or tí-pō-gráf'ik-ál-i), adv. 1. By means of types; after the manner of type-printers, as opposed to lithographic or copperplate methods.—2t. Emblematically figuratively.

typographerist (tí-pōg'ra-físt), n. [< typographic + -ist.] A student of typography; a person concerned with the art or history of printing. Athenæum, No. 3282, p. 412. [Rare.]

typography (tí-pōg'ra-fí), n. [= F. typographie = Sp. tipografía = Pg. typographia = It. tipografia = G. typographie = Sw. Dan. typografi = < Gr. τυπος, impression, type, + -γραφία, < γραφειν, write.] 1. The art of composing types and printing from them.

Caxton taught us typography about the year 1474. Johnson, Idler, No. 60.

2. In a restricted use, type-work; the branch of printing connected with composition; the preparation of matter in type for use in printing.—3. The general character or appearance of printed matter.—4t. Emblematic or hieroglyphic representation. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

tyrannidæ (ti-ran'ik-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Tyrannus + -idæ.] A family of passerine birds, named from the genus Tyrannus; the tyrant-birds or tyrant-flycatchers. There are many genera, and more than 400 species, inhabiting America, and chiefly presented in the Neotropical region. They are readily distinguished by the non-oscine (clamatorial or mesomyian) character of the syrinx, the acutelliptical tarsi of the mesopodometop type, ten primaries of which the first is not emarginate, twelve rectrices, and the bill almost invariably hooked at the end by an overhanging point of the upper mandible. The rictus as a rule is strongly bristled; the hind toe is leucodactylous, or freely movable apart from the others (as in oscine Passeres), and the outer and middle toes are united only at their bases. It is one of the most extensive and characteristic groups of its grade in the New World, only the Troglodytidae and Trochilidae approaching it in these respects. Its relationships are with the other non-oscine Passeres highly developed in and central to the Neotropical region, namely the Pipridæ and Cotingidæ; but not with the true flycatchers, or Muscicapidæ, to which many of the long-known species used to be referred. Only 8 or 9 genera extend into the United States, and of these only 5 (Tyrannus, Myiarchus, Sayornis, Empidonax, and Empidonax) have any extensive distribution that country. The genus Oxyrhynchus, without any mark of the beak, is often now separated as the type of another family, aside from this the Tyrannidæ are by law divided into 4 subfamilies—Troglodytidae, Platyrhynchidæ, Elanidæ, and Tyranninae. See cuts under tyrant, Empidonax, Fluvicola, king-bird, Megaryrhnchus, deulsus, peris, Platyrhynchus, Pyrocephalus, Sayornis, timorata, Troglodytes, Todirostrum, and Tyrannulus.

tyranninæ (tir-a-ni-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Tyrannus + -inæ.] A subfamily of Tyrannidæ, containing the true tyrant-flycatchers, of arboreal habits, and usually more or less extensively olivaceous coloration, sometimes gray, varied chiefly with white or yellow, and often with a bright-colored spot on the crown. Birds of this group abound throughout the woodlands of America, from the limit of trees both north and south, and play an important part in the economy of nature, comparable to that of the true flycatchers (Muscicapidæ) of the Old World. In the United States the scarletstart (Mimus forficatus), the common kingbird or bee-martin (Tyrannus carolinensis), the great redstart flycatcher (Myiarchus cinerascens), the pewee or water-pewee (Sayornis or Empidonax), the wood-pewee or house-bird (Contopus virens), and several smaller flycatchers of the genus Empidonax furnish characteristic examples of the Tyranninae. There are in all about 20 genera.

tyrannine (tir'a-nin), a. [Tyrannus + -ine.] Of or pertaining to the Tyranninae; relating to or resembling the genus Tyrannus: in a narrow sense applied to the larger tyrant-flycatchers, in distinction from the smaller tyrannuline forms. Tyranniscus (tir-a-nis'kus), n. [NL. (Cabanis and Heine, 1859), dim. of Tyrannus, q. v.] A genus of small tyrant-flycatchers, of the subfamily Elanidæ, containing about 11 species, ranging from Guatemala to southern Brazil, as T. nigricapillus and T. cinericeps.

tyrannise, v. See tyrannize.

tyrannish (ti'ra-nish), a. [ME. tyrannish, tyrannish; < tyran + -ish.] Like a tyrant; characteristic of a tyrant; tyrannical.

The proude tyrannish Roman Tarquinius, which was than king.
Gower, Conf. Amant., vii.

tyrannize (tir'a-niz), v.; pret. and pp. tyrannized, ppr. tyrannizing. [F. tyranniser = Sp. tyrannizar = Pg. tyrannizar = It. tyrannizzare, < Gr. τυραννίζειν, take the part of a tyrant, < τύραννος, tyrant: see tyrant.] I. intrans. 1. To act as a tyrant; exercise tyrannical power; rule despotically or cruelly: used of persons, with over before an object.
I made thee miserable,
What time I threw the people's suffrages
On him that thus doth tyrannize o'er me.
Shak., Tit. And., iv. 3. 20.

Hence—2. To have a tyrannical influence; exercise oppressive restraint; maintain arbitrary control: used of things, commonly with over.

Nor, while we trust in the mercy of God through Christ Jesus, [shall] fear be able to tyrannize over us.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 47.

The first and last lesson of the useful arts is that Nature tyrannizes over our works.
Emerson, Art.

II. trans. 1. To rule, treat, or affect tyrannically; act the tyrant to or over.

This is he that shal tyrannize the cite of Rome, and be the ruine of my house.
Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 164.

They would enjoyne a slavish obedience without law, which is the known definition of a tyrant and a tyrannized people.
Milton, Apology for Smeectymnus.

2†. To make tyrannically oppressive; convert into an instrument of tyranny.

Boisterous edicts tyrannizing the blessed ordinance of marriage into the quality of a most unnatural and unchristianly yoke.
Milton, Divorce, ii. 20.

Also spelled tyrannise.

tyrannoid (tir'a-noid), a. [Tyrannus + -oid.] Resembling or related to a tyrant-bird; belonging to the Tyrannoideæ.

Tyrannoideæ (tir-a-noi'dē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Tyrannus + -oidæ.] A superfamily of passerine birds, containing those families of Passeres which have a mesomyodian tracheobronchial syrinx and an independently movable hallux, divided into Heteromeri and Homomeri, according to the situation of the main artery of the thigh, and consisting of the families Xenicidæ (New Zealand), Philepittidæ (Madagascar), Pittidæ (Ethiopian, Oriental, and Australian), and the American Tyrannidæ, Pipridæ, Cotingidæ, and Phytotomidæ. Nine tenths of the species are American, and most of these Neotropical.

tyrannous (tir'a-nus), a. [tyran + -ous.] Of tyrannical character or quality; given to or marked by tyranny; harshly despotic.

And, like the tyrannous breathing of the north,
Shakes all our buds from growing.
Shak., Cymbeline, i. 3. 36.

And now the storm-blast came, and he Was tyrannous and strong.
Coleridge, Ancient Mariner, l.

tyrannously (tir'a-nus-i), adv. In a tyrannous manner; with tyrannical force or intent; despotically; cruelly.

There, being both together in the foud,
They each at other tyrannously flew.
Spenser, F. Q., v. ii. 13.

Julius before his Death tyrannously had made himself Emperor of the Roman Commonwealth.
Milton, Hist. Eng., ii.

Tyrannula (ti-ran'ū-lā), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1827), dim. of Tyrannus, q. v.] 1. A genus of tyrannuline flycatchers, the type of which is T. barbata. It has been loosely used for many small olivaceous species now distributed in different genera. Owing to its similarity to the name Tyrannulus of prior date, it is now disused, the species properly belonging to Tyrannula being called Myiobius.

2. [L. c.] A small tyrant-flycatcher of the above or some related genus; a tyrannuline.

tyrannuline (ti-ran'ū-lin), a. and n. [Tyrannula + -ine.] I. a. Pertaining to or related to the tyrannulus, or small tyrant-flycatchers, as distinguished from the larger or tyrannine forms.

II. n. A little olivaceous flycatcher; a member of the genus Tyrannula, or some similar bird. They are such as those figured under Contopus, Empidonax, and pewit.

Tyrannulus (ti-ran'ū-lus), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816), dim. of Tyrannus, q. v.] A genus of very small tyrant-flycatchers of tropical America, of the subfamily Elanidæ. The type is T. elatus, the so-called gold-naped wren of early writers, about Tyrannulus elatus.

23 inches long, with yellow crest, white throat, and short bill, tail, and wings, inhabiting the valley of the Amazon, and found northward to Panama.

Tyrannus (ti-ran'us), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1800), < L. tyrannus, tyrant: see tyrant.] The name-giving genus of Tyrannidæ, formerly loosely extended to embrace most of the larger species then known (so named from their irritable or irascible disposition and their tendency to tyrannize over other birds), now restricted to a few large stout flycatchers like the common king-bird or bee-martin of the United States, T. tyrannus, T. pipri, T. intrepidus, or T. carolinensis. They have the head with a vertical crest, the bill stout, hooked, and well-bristled, several outer primaries emarginate, the tail even or emarginate, and the coloration black and white, or gray and white, or olive and yellow. The gray king-bird of the West Indies and southern United States (T. dominicensis or T. griseus), the Arkansas flycatcher (T. verticalis) of the Western States and Territories, Cassin's and Couch's flycatchers of the Southwestern States and southward (T. vociferans and T. melancholicus), are additional examples; and others occur in the West Indies and Central and South America. See cut under king-bird.

tyranny (tir'a-ni), n.; pl. tyrannies (-niz). [ME. tirannye, < OF. (and F.) tyrannie = Pr. tirannia = Sp. tiranía = Pg. tyrannia = It. tirannia, < ML. tyrannia, tyrannia, < Gr. τυραννία, tyrannia, < τύραννος, tyrant: see tyrant.]

1. The rule of a tyrant in the ancient sense; the personal government of one of the Greek tyrants; a state or government having an uncontrolled ruler bearing the title of tyrant.

His [Cypselus's] moderation and clemency are allowed by all; yet he is universally called by the Grecian writers Tyrant of Corinth, and his government a Tyranny.
J. Adams, Works, IV. 507.

One might have thought . . . that, amid the endless changes that went on among the small commonwealths and tyrannies of that region, it would have been easier for the Republic to establish its dominion there than to establish it over great cities like Padua and Verona.
E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 288.

2. The office or incumbency of a tyrant; a tyrant's administration or tenure; the system of government by tyrants.

Aristotle . . . assigns to the tyranny of Periander a duration of 44 years.
Smith's Dict. Gr. and Rom. Biog., III. 191.

Hence—3. A tyrannical government; a lawless autocracy or despotism.

Polybius . . . in the Sixth Book of his History, says thus: "When Princes began to indulge their own Lusts and sensual Appetites, then Kingdoms were turned into so many Tyrannies."
Milton, Answer to Salmassius.

4. Arbitrary or unrestrained exercise of power; despotic abuse of authority; unmerciful rule.

Insulting tyranny begins to jet Upon the innocent and aweless throne.
Shak., Rich. III., ii. 4. 51.

The tyranny of wealthy and powerful subjects was the characteristic evil of the times.
Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

5. A tyrannical action or proceeding; an instance of despotic rule or conduct.

My meditations are how to revenge
Thy bloody tyrannies.
Lust's Dominion, v. 2.

Over an humble and obedient sweetness
Ungently to insult.
Ford, Lady's Trial, v. 2.

6. Severity; harshness; stringency.

The tyranny of the open night's too rough
For nature to endure. Shak., Lear, iii. 4. 2.

= Syn. 1. Despotism, Autocracy, etc. See despotism.—4. Oppression, Despotism, etc. See oppression.

tyrant (ti'rant), n. [Early mod. E. also ti-rant, also tyran, tyranne; < ME. tyrant, tyrant, ty-rant, tyraunt, also tyran, tyran, < OF. tyrant (with unorig. -t), tyran, tyran, F. tyran = Pr. tiran = Sp. tirano = Pg. tyranno = It. tiranno = D. tiran, tyran = G. Sw. tyrann = Dan. tyran, < L. tyrannus, < Gr. tyrannos, lord, master, sovereign; tyrant; root unknown.] 1. In ancient Greece, an irresponsible chief or magistrate with unlimited powers, owing his office primarily to insurrection or usurpation. The first tyrants, so called, were generally the leaders of risings against the oligarchies during the seventh and sixth centuries B. C. They ruled with the popular consent in nearly all the Greek states and colonies at one time or another, transmitting their power to their heirs until democracies or new oligarchies overthrew them. Others raised themselves to the position by direct conquest or conspiracy. The arbitrary government of the tyrants was sometimes beneficent, but more often extremely oppressive and cruel. The typical tyrant in the latter sense of the word was Dionysius the Elder, of Syracuse (405–367 B. C.).

The tyrant of the Chersonese
Was freedom's best and bravest friend;
That tyrant was Miltiades!
Byron, Don Juan, iii. 86 (song).

Hence—2. A wilfully arbitrary monarch or person in authority; a ruler or master who uses his power cruelly or oppressively; any person who treats those bound to him in any way as slaves to his will; an autocratic oppressor.

Let us define a Tyrant, not according to vulgar conceits, but the judgment of Aristotle, and of all Learned Men. He is a Tyrant who regards his own welfare and profit only, and not that of the People.

Milton, Ans. to Salmasius, xii.

A tyrant cannot reign and oppress by his single force; he must really interest, and interest prodigiously, a sufficient number of subordinate tyrants in the duration of his power.

Ames, Works, II. 280.

3. A tyrannical or compulsory influence; something that constrains the will inexorably; an overruling power.

For lordly love is such a Tyrannic fell
That where he rules all power he doth expell.

Spenser, Shep. Cal., October.

Thought emancipated itself from expression without becoming its tyrant.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 326.

4. In ornith., a tyrant-flycatcher; one of the Tyrannidae.—Bald tyrant. Same as baldhead, 3.—The Thirty Tyrants, a committee of thirty sympathizers with the oligarchs and with Sparta, who ruled Athens with absolute power 404–403 B. C. They were overthrown by the democracy under Thrasybulus.

tyrant (ti'rant), v. [Early mod. E. also tyran; < tyrant, n.] 1. trans. To tyrannize over.

What glorie or what guerdon hast thou [Love] found In feeble Ladies tyrannizing so sore?

Spenser, F. Q., IV. vii. 1.

II. intrans. To play the tyrant; tyrannize; sometimes with indefinite it.

This encouraged the Irish grandees (their O's and Mac's) to rant and tyrant it in their respective seigniories.

Fuller, Worthies, Buckinghamshire, I. 203.

tyrant-bird (ti'rant-bérd), n. A tyrant-flycatcher.

tyrant-chat (ti'rant-chat), n. Some tyrant-flycatcher which resembles or suggests a chat.

tyrant-flycatcher (ti'rant-flí'kach-ér), n. A tyrant-bird; any member of the Tyrannidae.

tyrantly (ti'rant-li), adv. [< ME. tyrantly; < tyrant + -ly.] In the manner of a tyrant; tyrannically.

He askde me tyrantly tribute of Rome,
That tenefully tynt was in tyme of myne elders.

Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I. 271.

tyranny (ti'rant-ri), n. Same as tyranny.

Wyclif, 3 Ki. [1 Ki.] xvi. 20.

tyrant-shrike (ti'rant-shrik), n. One of the larger tyrant-flycatchers with a stout bill resembling a shrike's, as any species of the genus Tyrannus proper, like the king-bird or bee-martin. Some of these used to be placed in the genus Lanius, being mistaken for shrikes. See cut under king-bird.

tyrant-wren (ti'rant-ren), n. One of the smaller tyrant-flycatchers, as a species of Tyrannulus, resembling a wren in some respects. See cut under Tyrannulus.

tyre¹. An obsolete spelling of tire.

tyre² (tir), n. [E. Ind.] A preparation of milk and rice used by the East Indians.

tyremesis (ti-rem'-e-sis), n. [< Gr. τυρός, cheese, + εμεσις, vomiting; see emesis.] Vomiting of cheesy or curdy matters. Also tyrosis.

Tyrian (tir'-i-an), a. and n. [= F. Tyrien, < L. Tyrius, < Gr. Τύριος, < τύρος, L. Tyros, Tyre (see def.).] 1. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the ancient city and state of Tyre in Phenicia, on the Mediterranean.—2. Of a purple color characteristic of Tyre.—Tyrian Cynosure, the constellation Ursa Minor, anciently called the Cynosure, which served as a guide to the Tyrians in their long voyages.

And thou shalt be our star of Arcady,
Or Tyrian Cynosure. Milton, Comus, l. 342.

Tyrian purple. See purple.

II. n. A native of Tyre.

tyrite (ti'rit), n. [< Icel. Tyr, Tyr (see Tyr), + -ite.] A variety of fergusonite found near Arendal in Norway.

tyro (ti'ró), n. [Formerly, and prop., tiro; < L. tiro, misspelled tyro, a newly levied soldier, a young soldier.] A beginner in learning anything; one who is employed in learning or who has mastered the rudiments only of any branch of knowledge; a novice.

There stands a structure on a rising hill,
Where tyros take their freedom out to kill.

Garth, Dispensary, iii.

tyrocinium (ti-ró-sin'-i-um), n. Same as tyrocin. Gayton. Compare tyrocinum.

tyrocin (ti-rós'-i-ni), n. [Prop. tyrocin*; < L. tyrocinum, first service or trial, < tiro, a newly levied soldier; see tyro.] The state of being a tyro, beginner, or learner; pupilage; apprenticeship; unskilled effort.

To thee I write my Apotheosis, Mæcenas, strengthen my Tyrocin.
Tourneur, Trans. Metamorphosis, Ded.

Tyroglyphidæ (ti-rō-glif'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < tyroglyphus + -idæ.] A family of atracheate Acarina, typified by the genus Tyroglyphus. They all have eight legs developed, of five joints apiece, chelate mandibles, skeleton composed of sclerites in a soft skin, and two front pairs of legs set below the body. The Tyroglyphidæ are usually parasitic during the curious hypopial stage, although they do not seem to require any nutriment from the host; and some species would appear to be parasitic in the adult stage, as Glyciphagus balnearum. The related families Sarcoptidæ and Myobridæ are strictly parasitic during every stage of their existence.

Tyroglyphus (ti-rōg'-li-fus), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1796), < Gr. τυρός, cheese, + γλυφειν, carve.] A notable genus of acarids or mites, typical of the family Tyroglyphidæ, having a tarsal claw and a sucker. Those of the subgenus Rhizoglyphus feed upon vegetable products, and comprise a, dorsal view of female; b, ventral view of female; c, mouth-parts; d, g, h, forms of tarsal appendages; e, ventral tubercles of male. (All the figures are much enlarged.)

about a dozen species. Those of Tyroglyphus proper feed upon animal products, and include among others the well-known cheese-mites, T. siro and T. longior—the latter feeding also upon farinaceous substances. (See cut under flour-mite.) T. phyloxerae preys upon the grape-vine phylloxera; T. entomophagus is a well-known pest in entomological collections.

Tyroler (ti-rō'-lér), n. [< G. Tyroler, Tiroler, a Tyrolean, < Tyrol, Tirol, Tyrol; see Tyrolese.] A native of Tyrol; a Tyrolean. [Rare.]

Tyrolese (tir-ō'-lēs' or -léz'), a. and n. [< Tyrol (G. Tirol, and improperly Tyrol) + -ese.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to Tyrol (often called the Tyrol), an Alpine province forming with Vorarlberg a crownland of the Cisleithan division of Austria-Hungary.

II. n. sing. and pl. A native or the natives of Tyrol.

Tyrolienne (ti-rō-li-en'), n. [F., fem. of Tyrolien, of or pertaining to Tyrol, < Tyrol, Tyrol.] A dance of the Tyrolean peasants, or a song; melody suitable for such a dance. The characteristic folk-songs of Tyrol abound in yodels.

tyroline (tir-ō'-lin), n. A violet dye produced by treatment of aniline; aniline violet. Ur. Diet., III. 1050.

tyrolite (tir-ō'-lit), n. [Also tirolite; < Tyr + -ite.] A hydrous arseniate of copper, occurring in orthorhombic crystals and in aggregates having a foliated micaceous structure. It is very soft, sectile, and flexible in thin scales, and is a bluish-green color. It is known from a number of localities, but is named from that at Falkenstein in Tyrol.

tyroma (ti-rō'-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. τυρός, cheese, + μα, falling off of the hair; alopecia.]

tyronism (ti-rō-nizm), n. [< tyro(n) + -ism.] The state of being a tyro. Also tyronism.

tyrosin (ti-rō-sin), n. [Irreg. < Gr. τυρός, cheese + -in.] A white crystalline body, odorless and insoluble in cold water, having the formula $C_9H_{11}NO_3$. It is an amido-acid, and forms salts with both acids and bases. It is a product of the decomposition of proteids, either by the ferment trypsin, by putrefaction, or by boiling with acids.

tyrosis (ti-rō'-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. τυρός, cheese + -osis.] 1. Same as tyremesis.—2. The curdling of milk.

tyrothrix (ti-rō-thriks), n. [NL., < Gr. τυρός, cheese, + θρίξ, hair.] A bacterium found in cheese.

tyrotoxin (ti-rō-tok'-si-kon), n. [NL., < Gr. τυρός, cheese, + τοξικόν, poison.] A ptomaine produced in milk or cheese, the cause of the symptoms of poisoning occasionally observed to follow the eating of ice-cream. It is either identical with or closely related to diazobenzoyl.

Tyrrhel's case. See case.

Tyrrhel's fascia. The rectovesical fascia.

Tyrrhel's hook. A fine hook used in certain operations on the eye for drawing forward the iris.

Tyrrhene (ti-rén'), a. [< L. Tyrrhenus, < Gr. τυρρηνός, < Τυρρηνία, the Gr. name of Etruria or Tuscan.] Same as Tyrrhenian.

Tyrrhenian (ti-rén'-ni-an), a. and n. [< Tyrrhen + -ian.] 1. a. Etruscan; used poetically, or in connection with subjects having some Greek relation or bearing.—Tyrrhenian Sea, a name used for that part of the Mediterranean which lies between Tuscany and the mainland southward and the islands of Sardinia and Corsica.

II. n. An Etruscan.

tyrrit, n. An old spelling of tirret.
Tyrtæan (tér-tæ'an), a. [< L. Tyrtæus, < Gr. Τυρταίος, Tyrtæus (see def.), + -an.] Of or pertaining to Tyrtæus, a Greek poet of the seventh century B. C., who wrote marching-song and elegiac exhortations for the Spartans.

tyrsant, n. A variant of tisane.

Tysonian (ti-sō'-ni-an), a. [< Tyson (see def.) + -ian.] Of or pertaining to, or named after the anatomist Tyson; specifying the preputial glands or follicles which secrete the sebaceous substance smegma.

tysonite (ti-sōn'-it), n. [After S. T. Tyson, the discoverer.] A rare fluorid of the cerium metals, occurring in hexagonal crystals and massive, of a wax-yellow color; found in Colorado.

II. a. Of or pertaining to Hungarian Gipsies used in English chiefly with reference to their music.

tzopilotl (tsō'-pi-lotl), n. [Mex.] Same as zopilote.

1. The twenty-first character and fifth vowel-sign in the English alphabet. The Phœnician alphabet, from which ours comes ultimately (see under A), had no such sign, but ended with T. A sign for the u-sound (that is, for oo, or ô, as it is represented in the respelling of this dictionary) was added by the Greeks when they adapted the Phœnician signs to their own use, and was written in differently V or Y; but the latter finally established itself as the accepted form in Greek usage, while the former became customary in the derived Italian alphabets; so that, considerably later, the Romans were able to import Y as a separate and foreign character, to represent the foreign Greek sound û (= French u, German ü or ue), into which the Greek ô had meanwhile become to a great extent altered in pronunciation. The V was also commonly written with its angle rounded, as U, and Y and U were for a long time merely different forms of the same sign (like I and J); it is only recently that they have come to be always distinctly held apart, and have different values given them. As W also is a doubled U or V, it appears that our four letters U, V, W, and Y all come from a single sign added by the Greeks at the end of the Phœnician system. The sound originally and properly represented by the character, and still belonging to it in most languages outside of English, is the oo or ô sound, as in moon, move, rule, and the like, the closest of the labial vowels, or rounded vowels, as they are often called (see under O); but this value the letter has in English only in exceptional cases. What we call "long u," namely, is this same sound with the semivowel y prefixed, as yoo (yô); and what we call "short u" is the more open of the two shades of neutral vowel-sound. The digraphs ue, eu, and eo also have, as long, the yô-value in the same manner and degree. The y-element in the sound, namely, is not always alike full and undeniable, but varies somewhat, according to the difficulty of slipping it in after a preceding consonant. After a guttural (k, g) or a labial (p, b, m, v), as when initial, the utterance is completely yô, but after the tongue-tip letters (t, d, n, th, s, z, l, r) the insertion of y involves a more difficult combination of movements of the tongue, and the element is apt to be slighted, being reduced rather to a bit of t; and in the practice of many speakers, and in certain localities, it is even omitted altogether, so that the yô becomes simple ô, new being pronounced no, herid lorid, and so on. The difficulty in the way of inserting the y, however, is removed if the preceding syllable has the accent; and hence even those who pronounce penô riô us say pen yô riô, and so in all other like cases. This omission of the y-element is not approved, but is stigmatized as provincial or vulgar, although practised by many educated and careful speakers, and probably becoming more prevalent. It is more generally condoned, and even accepted, after t than after t, d, n, etc., and some standard authorities in England itself now pronounce and teach tô instead of tû; in this dictionary the u is so marked if it occurs after t preceded by another consonant, as in fluid (fô-id). After r, the difficulty of adding the y-sound before a vowel is greater than after any other tongue-tip consonant; hence in this situation the pronunciation of "long u" as ô is almost universally accepted and practised. Further, after t, d, s, z, "long u" becomes ô when the y-element is as it were absorbed into them, converting them (see the different letters) into ch, j, sh, and zh; nor is the y-element heard when u follows any of these sounds having an independent origin, as in jury, etc. The real short u-sound, or that corresponding to ô as long, is in a limited number of words also represented by u, as in bull, put, etc.; also by double o, as in look, foot, etc. What we call "short u" is in the great majority of cases written with u, but also with o, as in son, with oo, as in blood, and with ou, as in young, and in the slighted pronunciation of unaccented syllables with almost any vowel. Cases like bury and busy and buy are anomalous and isolated. A u is always written after g, and this u (save in the exceptional cases in which it is silent) has a consonantal value, being pronounced as the semivowel w; and it is so treated sometimes also after other consonants, especially s, as in suave, persuade, anguish. U is silent in many words after g, having only (as in French) the office of preserving the hard sound of the g; thus, guile, plague. Like i and y, u is never doubled.

2. As a symbol: (a) The chemical symbol of uranium. (b) In quaternions, an operational sign which, prefixed to the symbol of a quaternion, denotes the versor of that quaternion. (c) In the theory of heat, a symbol used to denote the energy, or the sum of the increment of heat and the heat consumed. (d) [l. c.] In the calculus, the symbol of a function. (e) [l. c.] In hydrodynamics, used with v and w to denote the rectangular components of the velocity.

Uakari, n. Same as saki.
Ubbenite (ub'e-nit), n. [Ubbe (Ubben)] (see def.) + -ite. One of a German sect of moderate Anabaptists, founded in 1534 by one Ubbe Phillips. The Ubbenites rejected the doctrine of divorce, and differed from the rest of the Anabaptists by denying that the kingdom of Christ is an earthly kingdom, in which the righteous are to exterminate the wicked. (New-decker, in Schaff-Herzog's Relig. Encyc.) Also Ubbonite.

ubeity (û-bé'i-ti), n. [ML. ubeita (-t), ubeity, < L. ubi, where.] The state of being in a definite place; whereness; ubiety.

uberous (û'be-rus), a. [ML. uberous, fruitful, < L. uber, fruitful, fertile; cf. uber, udder, teat, = E. udder: see udder.] Yielding largely or copiously; fruitful; productive; prolific.

About the fruitful flanks of uberous Kent,

A fat and olive soil.

Middleton (and another), Mayor of Queenborough, ff. 3.

uberty (û'bér-ti), n. [ME. ubertee, < *OF. uberte = Pg. uberdade = It. ubertà, < L. uberta (-t), abundance, fruitfulness, < uber, fruitful: see uberous.] Fertility; productiveness; fruitfulness; abundant yield.

And take not him [vines] that here a grape or two,

But hem that kneeleth down for ubertes.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 64.

ubication (û-bi-kā'shon), n. [= Sp. ubication = Pg. ubicação, < L. ubi, where (prob. for cubi*, quobi*, < qui, who, quid, what, + -bi, a locative suffix).] 1. Situation; position; local relation; place of rest or lodgment. [Rare.]—2. Ubiety; whereness.

Among other solutions, he suggests that the board affects the upper weight, which it does not touch, by determining its ubication or whereness. Whewell.

ubiety (û-bi'e-ti), n. [NL. ubieta (-t), replacing the medieval ubicia (-t), ubiety, < L. ubi, where.] 1. The state of being in a definite place; ubiety. Ubiety is generally said to be either repetitive, circumscriptive, or definitive; but these terms are taken in different senses by different authors. According to the best usage, repetitive ubiety is that of a body which excludes other bodies from its place by its absolute impenetrability; circumscriptive ubiety is that of any extended image which is in a place part by part without excluding other objects; definitive ubiety is connection with a portion of space, all in every part, and not part by part.

Ubiety. Local relation; whereness. Johnson.

If my ubiety did not so nearly resemble ubiety, that in Anywhereness and Everwhereness I know where I am. Southey, The Doctor, cxcii. (Davies.)

2. Ubiety; omnipresence.

ubiquarian (û-bi-kwā'ri-an), a. and n. [L. ubique, everywhere (see ubiquitous), + -arian.] I. a. Existing everywhere; ubiquitous; ubiquitous. [Rare.]

Have ye, ye sage Intendants of the whole,

A ubiquarian presence and control?

Cooper, Tirocinium, 1. 266.

II. n. [cap.] Same as Ubiquitarian, 2.

ubiquist (û'bi-kwist), n. [= F. ubiquiste = Sp. Pg. ubiquista, < L. ubique, everywhere, + -ist.] Same as ubiquitarian.

ubiquitaire (û-bik-wi-tā'r), a. [F. ubiquitaire: see ubiquitary.] Ubiquitary. Howell, Letters, I. vi. 13.

ubiquitarian (û-bik-wi-tā'ri-an), n. and a. [L. ubiquitarius + -an.] I. n. 1. One who exists everywhere. Bailey, 1727.—2. [cap.] One who holds to the omnipresence of the body of Christ. The name of Ubiquitarians is commonly given to those among the Lutherans who held the doctrine of the ubiquity of Christ's body, maintaining it as an explanation of the real presence of his body in the eucharist. Their opponents regarded this view as denying a special sacramental presence and as confounding the two natures of Christ. For the latter reason the name is sometimes given to the Monophysites. Also Ubiquarian, Ubiquist.

II. a. 1. Omnipresent; existing everywhere.—2. [cap.] Belonging or pertaining to the Ubiquitarians: as, Ubiquitarian doctrines or arguments.

Ubiquitarianism (û-bik-wi-tā'ri-an-izm), n. [L. ubiquitarianus + -ism.] The doctrines of the Ubiquitarians. Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 75.

ubiquitariness (û-bik'wi-tā'ri-ness), n. The state of being ubiquitous; existence everywhere. Fuller, Ch. Hist., X. i. § 31.

ubiquitary (û-bik'wi-tā-ri), a. and n. [= F. ubiquitaire = Sp. ubicuario = Pg. ubicuario, n.; as ubiquit-y + -ary.] I. a. Being everywhere or in all places; ubiquitous.

She can conjure,

And I am her ubiquitary spirit.

Massinger, Emperor of the East, I. 2.

The ubiquitary and omnipresent essence of God.

Sir T. Broume, Religio Medici, I. 35.

II. n.; pl. ubiquitaries (-riz). 1. One who is or exists everywhere.

There is a nymph too of a most curious and elaborate strain, light, all motion, an ubiquitary, she is everywhere. B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, II. 1.

2. [cap.] A Ubiquitarian.

God is so omnipresent as that the Ubiquitary will needs have the body of God everywhere. Donne, Sermons, vii.

Ubiquitarian (û-bik'wi-tiz-m), n. [L. ubiquit-y + -ism.] The doctrines of the Ubiquitarians.

Ubiquitist (û-bik'wi-tist), n. [L. ubiquit-y + -ist.] Same as Ubiquitarian, 2.

ubiquitous (û-bik'wi-tus), a. [L. ubiquit-y + -ous.] Being or existing everywhere; actually or apparently omnipresent: often used in an exaggerated or humorous sense.

Whoever travelled from Brussels to Madrid in order to escape the influence of the ubiquitous Cardinal was sure to be confronted with him in the inmost recesses of the King's cabinet as soon as he was admitted to an audience. Motley, Dutch Republic, I. 423.

ubiquitously (û-bik'wi-tus-li), adv. In a ubiquitous manner; in a manner involving real or apparent omnipresence.

ubiquitousness (û-bik'wi-tus-ness), n. The state or character of being ubiquitous.

ubiquity (û-bik'wi-ti), n. [OF. ubiquite, F. ubiquité = Sp. ubicuidad = Pg. ubiquidade, < L. ubique, everywhere, < ubi, where: see ubication.]

1. Omnipresence, or a capacity of being in an indefinite number of places at the same time, not strictly amounting to omnipresence: as, the ubiquity of Christ's body; the ubiquity of the king (see below).

This is the consolation of all good men, unto whom his ubiquity affordeth continual comfort and security.

Sir T. Broume, Vulg. Err., I. 2.

2. The doctrines or beliefs of the Ubiquitarians.

No one sequel urged by the apostles against the Galatians, for joining circumcision with Christ, but may be as well enforced against the Lutherans holding ubiquity.

I. Walton, Hooker.

3†. Locality; neighborhood; whereabouts.

Fem she hight,

A solemn weight

As you should meet

In any street

In that ubiquity.

B. Jonson, Love's Welcome at Welbeck.

Ubiquity of the king, in law. See the quotation.

A consequence of this prerogative is the legal ubiquity of the king. His majesty, in the eye of the law, is always present in all his courts, though he cannot personally distribute justice. His judges are the mirrors by which the king's image is reflected. It is the royal office, and not the royal person, that is always present in court, always ready to undertake prosecutions, or pronounce judgment, for the benefit and protection of the subject. And from this ubiquity it follows that the king can never be non-suit; for a nonsuit is the desertion of a suit or action by the non-appearance of the plaintiff in court. For the same reason, also, in the forms of legal proceedings, the king is not said to appear by his attorney, as other men do; for in contemplation of law he is always present in court.

Blackstone, Com., I. vii.

ubi supra (û'bi sū'prā). [L. ubi, where; supra, above: see supra.] In the place above mentioned: marking reference to some passage or page before named.

U-bolt (û'bôlt), n. A bar of iron bent into the form of the letter U, fitted with a screw and nut at each end. It is used in car-building to form carriers and supports for brake-rods, chains, and other connections.

Richardson, Pamela, I. 220.

Ugrian (ô'gri-an), a. [From the name of a Finnish tribe.] Noting the Finno-Hungarian group of languages, comprising the tongues of the Lapps, Finns, and Magyars or Hungarians. It is a branch of the Ural-Altaic family.

Ugrik (ô'grik), a. Same as Ugrian.

Ugro-Altaic (ô'grô-al'tä'ik), a. Same as Ural-Altaic. See Altaic. Nature, XXXIV. 41.

ugsome (ug'sum), a. [ME. ugsom; < ug, n., + -some.] Ugly; hideous; disgusting; loathsome. [Obsolete or provincial.]

An ugsom noyse, that noyet the pepull,

With wepyng and waille wo to behold.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 13734.

Since she has kiss'd thy ugsome mouth,

She never shall kiss mine.

Sir Hugh le Blond (Child's Ballads, III. 256).

ugsomeness (ug'sum-nes), n. The state of being ugly; ugliness. Bp. Fisher, Seven Penitential Psalms, Ps. xxxviii. [Now only provincial.]

uhlan, ulan (ô'lan or ô'lan), n. [= F. uhlan, hulan, houlan, < G. uhlan, uhlane, ulane, a lancer, < Pol. ulan, hulan (barred l) = Bohem. ulan, hulan, a lancer, uhlan, < Turk. oġlan, oglan, oghlan, in popular pron. ölan, a son, boy, lad, servant, < Tatar oġlan, a son, child (formerly used as a title of princes); cf. Turk. oġul, ogul, oghl, < Tatar oġul, a son.] A soldier mounted and armed with a lance, and wearing a kind of semi-Oriental dress with loose hanging sleeves and very baggy trousers: originally known in the eastern countries of Europe. Uhlanes were armed with a curved simitar besides the lance. Under Marshal Saxe, a corps of uhlans was temporarily established in the French army. At the present time the name is given to light cavalry armed with the lance; the Prussian uhlans are especially renowned.

Uigurian (wi-gô'ri-an), a. Of or pertaining to a tribe of the Turkish race called Uigurs. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 750.

uintahite (ü-in'ta-hit), n. [Uintah (see def.) + -ite.] A native hydrocarbon resembling asphaltum, found in considerable deposits in the Uintah Mountains in Utah. It is black, lustrous, breaks with a conchoidal fracture, fuses in a candle-flame, and burns, giving a bright flame, like sealing-wax. It has also been called gilsontite.

Uintatheriida (ü-in'ta-thē-rī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Uintatherium + -idae.] A family of fossil perissodactyl mammals of huge size, from the lower Tertiary formations of the western United States, representing an order Dinocera, widely distinct from any of the existing perissodactyls: named from the genus Uintatherium. See cut under Dinoceras.

Uintatherium (ü-in'ta-thē-rī-um), n. [NL. (Leidy, 1872), < Uintah (the Uintah Mountains in Utah) + Gr. θήριον, a wild beast.] 1. The typical genus of Uintatheriida, originally based on fragmentary material, and now believed to be synonymous with Dinoceras of same ostensible date. — 2. [l. c.] An animal of this genus.

uji (ô'ji), n. [Jap. uji, maggot.] A disease of the silkworm of commerce, occurring in Japan, due to the attacks of a tachinid fly, Ujimyia (or Leskia) sericaria. See Ujimyia.

uji-fly (ô'ji-fi), n. A dipterous insect of the tachinid genus Ujimyia (or Leskia), U. sericaria, whose larva is the silkworm-parasite of Japan.

Ujimyia (ü-ji-mī-i-ä), n. [NL. (Rondani, 1870, as Ugimyia), < Jap. uji, maggot, + Gr. μυία, fly.] A genus of tachinid flies, perhaps synonymous with Leskia, erected for the uji-fly of Japan, U. sericaria. This fly is said by Sasaki to possess the abnormal habit of depositing its eggs upon the mulberry-leaf, which is then eaten the silkworm, the eggs hatching and the larvæ descending within the body of the latter, instead of, as is usual with technicists, laying its eggs upon the body of the worm. See Leckia.

U. An abbreviation of United Kingdom (of Great Britain and Ireland).

ukase (ū-kās'), n. [= F. ukase, oukase = Sp.
ukase = Pg. ukase = G. ukas, < Russ. ukaz, an edict; edict; cf. ukaznivat, ukazati, show, lieute, order, prescribe, < y- + kazati, show.]
An edict or order, legislative or administrative, emanating from the Russian government. Ukases have the force of laws till they are annulled by subsequent decisions. A collection of the ukases issued at different periods, made by order of the emperor Nicholas, and supplemented since year by year, constitutes the ukase of the Russian empire.

In former times, cruel punishments with whips used to be ordered in imperial circulars as well as in Imperial ukases. A. J. C. Hare, Russia, I.

ukase—2. Any official proclamation.

Lord Canning is probably not nearly as enthusiastic with respect to the effect of the Proclamation as he was last year, when he issued his famous ukase to the landlords of India. W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 280.

n. See uhlan.

ulcer (ul'sér), n. [= F. ulcère = Sp. Pg. ulcera
It. ulcera, ulcere, ulcero, < L. ulcus (ulcer-), = ulcus (ulcer-), a sore, ulcer, = Gr. ἔλκος, wound, sore, ulcer.] 1. A sore in any of the soft parts of the body, open either to the surface or to some natural cavity, and attended with a secretion of pus or some kind of exudate; a solution of continuity of the skin of the body, or of the investing tissue of any natural cavity, the result of morbid action, not mechanical injury nor of a healthy repara-tory process. A wound may become an ulcer, but is not an ulcer unless diseased action is set up. An abscess is a collection of pus within the tissue of a part which has formed around a central excavation with a contracted orifice or none. Ulcers have been divided into local and constitutional, but this distinction is not obvious. They are also treated as simple or specific sores. Most ulcers are both constitutional and specific—that is, the local exhibition of a specific disease which infects the whole system, as the diphtheritic, syphilitic, or the carcinomatous; others are less obviously specific, as the scrofulous or the scorbutic.

Hence, figuratively, a sore, blot, stain, or blemish of reproach, in an ethical sense: as, an ulcer of the body politic.

To feed the living ulcer of a corroding memory.

Burke, Rev. in France.

ulcer or Aleppo ulcer, a cutaneous affection occurring in the East, which, beginning as a small red papule, grows, purifies, and finally ulcerates. The etiology is obscure, but apparently there has been great freedom in the application of the name to skin-diseases of this type when occurring in the East. There seems to be no essential difference in the meaning of the following terms: Delhi boil, Aleppo boil, Aleppo gall, Biskra button, Pend-i ulcer, Delhi sore, Oriental sore, Persian ulcer, and many others, qualified by the name of some Eastern town or country. They are all classed under the one name endemic. Perforating ulcer of the foot. See perforating. Varicose ulcer. See varicose.—Warty ulcer. See warty.

ulcer (ul'sér), v. i. and t. [< OF. ulcerer, F. ulcer = Sp. Pg. ulcerar = It. ulcerare, < L. ulcere, make sore, < ulcus (ulcer-), a sore, ulcer; = ulcer, n.] To ulcerate. Fuller, Holy and Infame State, V. vi. 3. [Rare.]

ulcerable (ul'sér-a-bl), a. [< ulcer + -able.] Capable of becoming ulcerated.

ulcerate (ul'sér-āt), v.; pret. and pp. ulcerated, ulcerating. [< L. ulceratus, pp. of ulcerare, make sore; see ulcer, v.] I. Intrans. To form an ulcer or ulcers; become converted into an ulcer.
II. Trans. To affect with, or as with, an ulcer or ulcers.

Some depend upon the intemperament of the part ulcerated; others upon the continual afflux of the lacerative humors.

Harvey, Consumptions.

His heart was ulcerated with hatred.
Macaulay, Frederic the Great.

ulcerated tooth, a popular term for purulent inflammation of the gums about a decayed, dead, or loose tooth.

ulceration (ul'sér-ā-sh'yon), n. [< OF. ulceration, = ulceration = Sp. ulceración = Pg. ulceração
It. ulcerazione, < L. ulceratio (n-), a breaking it into sores; < ulcerare, pp. ulceratus, make sore; see ulcer, ulcerate, v.] 1. The formation of an ulcer.—2. The result of such formation; an ulcer.

ulcerative (ul'sér-ā-tiv), a. [< OF. ulcerativus, = Pr. ulcerativus = Sp. It. ulcerativo, = ulcerate + -ive.] 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of an ulcer or ulcers.—2. Causing or producing ulcers. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxiii. 2.

ulceratory (ul'sér-ā-tō-ri), a. [< ulcerate +
-ry.] Ulcerative.

ulcered (ul'sér-d), a. [< ulcer + -ed.] Having become an ulcer; affected with an ulcer; ulcerated.

ulcerous (ul'sér-us), a. [< OF. ulcerex, F. ulcér-eux = Sp. Pg. It. ulceroso, < L. ulcerosus, full of sores, < ulcus (ulcer-), a sore; see ulcer.]

1. Pertaining to or of the nature of an ulcer or ulcers.

She whom the spital-house and ulcerous sores

Would cast the gorge at. Shak., T. of A., iv. 3. 39.

2. Exhibiting ulceration; affected with ulcer or ulcers.

Strangely-visited people,

All swollen and ulcerous. Shak., Macbeth, iv. 3. 151.

Ulcerous stomatitis. See stomatitis.

ulcerously (ul'sér-us-li), adv. In an ulcerous manner.

ulcerousness (ul'sér-us-nēs), n. The state of being ulcerous.

ulcuscle (ul'kus-i), n. [< L. ulcusculum, dim. of ulcus (ulcer-), a sore; see ulcer.] Same as ulcuscule.

ulcuscle (ul'kus'kūl), n. [< L. ulcusculum; see ulcuscle.] A small ulcer.

ule (ū'le), n. [< Mex. ule, hule, caoutchouc.]
The tree.

-ule. [F. -ule = Sp. Pg. -ulo = It. -ulo, -olo, <
L. -ulus, m., -ula, f., -ulum, n., a dim. termination. Cf. -cule, -cle.] A diminutive termination in many words from the Latin, as in capsule, glandule, globule, nodule, etc. It often appears unrecognized as -le, as in circle, scruple, etc., and in the original Latin form -ulus in calculus, annulus, etc.
It also appears in the compound terminations -cule, -cle (which see). It is much used in the formation of new terms in zoology and botany.

ulema (ū'le-mā), n. [= F. uléma, ouléma = Sp.
ulema, < Ar. uléma, pl. of 'alim, learned, one who knows, < 'alima, know; see alma.] The Moslem doctors of sacred law and theological science, especially those belonging to the religious hierarchy of the Turkish empire, with the Sheikh ul Islam at their head: a collective term.

ule-tree (ū'le-trē), n. A Mexican tree, Castilloa elastica, from the milky juice of which caout-chouc is obtained. See cut under Castilloa.

ulex, a shrub resembling rosemary; according to some, furze, or perhaps Anthyllis Hermannia.] A genus of leguminous plants, of the tribe Gemisteæ and subtribe Cytiseæ; the furze.
It is distinguished from the related genus Cytisus by its deeply two-tipped membranous and colored calyx. It includes about 10 or 12 species, natives of western Europe or northwestern Africa—one species, U. nanus, extending east nearly to Nice; and another, U. europæus, perhaps to Tuscany. They are spiny shrubs without genuine leaves, the leaves being reduced to a spine, petiole, or scale. The yellow flowers are solitary or racemose at the ends of the branches. For Ulex genistoides (Stenacanthus aphyllus), see cross-spine. U. europæus, which also extends to the Azores and Canary Islands, and occurs naturalized on high mountains in Jamaica, is the common furze, gorse, or whin of Great Britain. See furze.

ulexine (ū'lek-sin), n. [< Ulex + -ine.] An alkaloid prepared from Ulex europæus, the common gorse or furze. It has been employed as a diuretic in cases of dropsy due to heart-disease.

ulexite (ū'lek-sit), n. [Named after G. L. Ulex, a German chemist.] A hydrous borate of calcium and sodium, occurring in loose rounded masses with fibrous structure and white color.
Also called boronatrocalcite, natroborealcite.

uliginous (ū'lij-i-nōs), a. [< ME. utiginose, < L.
uliginosus; see utiginosus.] 1. Moist; muddy; uliginous. Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.),

p. 180.—2. In nat. hist., living or growing in the mud or in muddy places. Also utiginose.

uliginous (ū'lij-i-nus), a. [< F. uliginus = It.
uliginoso, < L. uliginosus, full of moisture, damp, = uligo, moisture, marshiness, for uiliigo*, < uvere, be wet or damp; see humid. Cf. uliginose.] Muddy; oozy; slimy. Woodward.

ullage (ul'āj), n. [< OF. ullage, ocellage, "the filling up of leakie wine vessels" (Cotgrave), < oeiller, eullier, auillier, "fill up wine vessels that have leaked" (Cotgrave), lit. fill to the 'eye' or bung, < ocul, eye, < L. oculus, eye; see ocular, eyelet. According to Skeat, the OF. verb is prob. < OF. eure, ore, border, brim, < L. ora, brim; see orle.] In com., the wantage of a cask, or the estimated measure of the empty part of a cask of liquor.

ullet (ul'et), n. [A dial. form of owlet.] A howlet or hoot-owl; specifically, the tawny, brown, or wood owl, Strix (or Syrnium) aluco.

Ullmannia (ul-man'i-ā), n. [NL., named after J. C. Ullmann, a German mineralogist and statesman (1771–1821).] The name given by Göppert (in 1850) to a fossil plant previously considered to belong to the Algae, but now placed among the conifers. Only leaves and stems of this plant, found chiefly in the Permian, are as yet known, which is placed by Schenk, together with Walchia and Pagiophyllum, in the family Walchiæ.

ullmannite (ul-man'it), n. [Named after J. C.
Ullmann; see Ullmannia.] A sulphid of nickel and antimony, part of the latter being frequently replaced by arsenic. It generally occurs massive with a granular structure, and is of a gray color with a metallic luster.

Ulloa's circle. See circle of Ulloa, under circle.

Ulmaceæ (ul-mā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Mirbel, 1815), < Ulmus + -aceæ.] A former order of plants, the elm family, consisting of the two tribes Ulmææ and Celtidææ, both now classed under the order Urticaceæ.

ulmaceous (ul-mā'shi-us), a. In bot., of or pertaining to the Ulmaceæ.

Ulmææ (ul'mē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1847), <
Ulmus + -eæ.] A tribe of trees, the elm tribe, of the order Urticaceæ. It is characterized by erect anthers, two stigmatose style-branches, a straight embryo with broad cotyledons, flower-buds produced on leafless yearly branches, and a compressed fruit with oblique apex, commonly a dry samara. The tribe includes, besides the type genus Ulmus, three monotypic genera—two of India and Brazil, and one, Planera, native in the United States.

ulmic (ul'mik), a. [< L. ulmus, elm, + -ic.]
Noting an acid found in earth-mold, a product of the decay of vegetable matter. See ulmin.

ulmin (ul'min), n. [< L. ulmus, elm, + -in.]

1. A name given to various substances which are present in vegetable mold, peat, etc. The name has also been applied to a dark-brown substance which exudes from the elm, oak, and various other trees.
It has also been called humus, humine, gein. See humus.

2. A brown substance produced by the action of strong acids or alkalis on various organic bodies, especially by heating treacle or alcohol with strong sulphuric acid, thoroughly washing the residue with water, then triturating it with gum, and drying the mixture.

ulmo (ul'mō), n. A rosaceous tree of Chili:
same as muermo.

ulmous (ul'mus), a. [< L. ulmus, elm, + -ous.]
In chem., noting a group of brown or black substances in which ulmin or ulmic acid is present, occurring in vegetable mold, peat, etc.;
humous.

Ulmus (ul'mus), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), = L. ulmus, elm; see elm.] A genus of trees,
the elms, type of the tribe Ulmææ in the order Urticaceæ. It is characterized by a stalked fruit surrounded with a broad wing, and containing flat cotyledons.
There are about 16 species, widely scattered through the north temperate regions, extending in Asia to mountains within the tropics. They bear alternate serrate two-ranked feather-veined leaves on slender and often recurving branches which form a graceful flat spray. The flower-clusters contain numerous small apetalous flowers, almost all perfect or mainly staminate, in 4 North American species preceding the leaves, and followed by disk-like notched and velvety samaras, which fall as the leaves expand. (See cut under amarant.) Several other species are European and late-flowering, as U. parvifolia of China and Japan. Five species occur in the United States (for which see elm, slippery-elm, rock-elm, and wahoo). Three species occur in Europe, all of them extending into Asia—U. campestris, the common Old World elm (see cut under elm), parent of very numerous cultivated varieties; U. effusa (U. pedunculata), the water-elm of central Europe; and U. montana, the wych-elm, the only one thought to be native to Great Britain.

Americana, U. effusa, and also U. Wallichiana, the Himalayan elm, sometimes reach a very large size, from 60 to 100 feet high, and 7 to 8 feet in diameter. U. pumila, the dwarf elm of Siberia, a very low shrub, forms the extreme of the genus. U. effusa, the common village elm of Prussia, is peculiar in forming sharp ribs about its base in old age, which serve as natural buttresses.

ulna (ul'ni), n.; pl. ulnae (-nē). [NL., < L. ulna = Gr. ὐλῆν, elbow: see ell.] 1. The inner one of the two bones of the forearm, between the elbow and the wrist, the other being the radius; the bone which makes a strict hinge-joint at the elbow with the humerus, and about which the radius revolves in pronation and supination, when the ulna reaches to the wrist and these movements are practicable. The ulna is commonly the smaller one of the two bones, especially below, where its end is little more than a pivot for rotation of the wrist, the hand being almost entirely borne upon the end of the radius. In many animals the ulna is reduced by shortening, and in some it appears merely as a process of the radius, ankylosed upon the proximal end of the latter, as in bats, and in hoofed quadrupeds generally. In man, in animals generally which use their fore paws as hands, and in birds it is perfect, and extends the whole length of the forearm. Its proximal end has a large sigmoid cavity for articulation with the humerus, often a lesser sigmoid cavity for the head of the radius, and a prominent process, the olecranon, or head of the ulna, forming the greatest convexity of the back of the elbow. See cuts under carpus, Catarrhina, Elephantinae, forearm, pinion, Plesiosaurus, and shoulder.

2. In entom., the stigmatic or marginal vein of the fore wing. Walker; Haliday.—3. A unit of length; a cubit; an ell.—4. In ichth., the hypercoracoid. Owen.—Oblique line (or ridge) of the ulna. See oblique.—Tubercle of the ulna. See tubercle. ulnad (ul'nad), adv. [ulna + -ad.] Toward or in the direction of the ulna; toward the ulnar aspect of the forearm.

ulnager (ul'naj), n. Same as alnage. ulnager (ul'naj-er), n. Same as alnager. ulnar (ul'nar), a. [ulna, ulnar, < L. ulna, ulna: see ulna.] 1. Of or pertaining to the ulna.—2. Of or pertaining to that side of the fore limb upon which the ulna is situated: as, the ulnar border of the forearm; the ulnar bone of the wrist (see ulnare): opposed to radial.—Anterior ulnar vein. See vein.—Common ulnar vein. See vein.—Ulnar artery, the larger of the two vessels resulting from the division of the brachial at the elbow, extending along the inner side of the forearm into the palm of the hand, where it forms the superficial palmar arch. Besides numerous muscular branches, it gives off the anterior and posterior ulnar recurrent arteries (see recurrent), the interosseous, and the anterior and posterior ulnar carpal. — Ulnar carpal arteries, two small branches, the anterior and the posterior, given off from the ulnar artery at the wrist to the anterior and posterior surfaces. — Ulnar nerve, a large branch of the brachial plexus, from the inner cord, distributed to the elbow-joint, ulnocarpal and deep digital flexors, and some of the muscles and a part of the skin of the hand. It gives off the dorsalis ulnar, or dorsal cutaneous branch, to the skin of the wrist and hand, the palmaris superficialis to the palmaris brevis and skin of the little finger, and the palmaris profundus to most of the small muscles of the palm.

ulnar (ul'nā-rē), n.; pl. ulnar (-ri-ā). [NL. (see os, bone), neut. of ulnar: see ulnar.] 1. A bone of the wrist, that one of the proximal carpal bones which is upon the ulnar side, in man the cuneiform: opposed to radiale. See cuts under Artiodactyla, carpus, hand, Perissodactyla, and Plesiosaurus.—2. In ornith., that one of the two free carpal bones which is upon the ulnar side (the other being the radiale), not necessarily with the implication that it is the cuneiform of a mammal. See cut under pinion. ulnocarpal (ul-nō-kār'pal), a. Common to the ulna and the carpus: as, an ulnocarpal articulation.

ulnometacarpal (ul-nō-met-a-kār'pal), a. Of or pertaining to the ulna and the metacarpus: specifying certain muscles of a bird's wing. Also ulnometacarpal.

ulnometacarpalis (ul-nō-met-a-kār-pā'lis), n.; pl. ulnometacarpales (-lēz). [NL.: cf. ulnometacarpal.] In ornith., a muscle of the wing which arises from the ulna and is inserted into a metacarpal bone. Two such muscles are distinguished as ulnometacarpalis ventralis and dorsalis. Also ulnometacarpalis.

ulnoradial (ul-nō-rā'di-al), a. Of or pertaining to the ulna and the radius; common to these bones, as an articulation.

Ulodendron (ū-lō-den'drōn), n. [NL., < Gr. ὤλεν, a scar (< ὤλεν, be whole or sound, become healed), & δένδρον, tree.] A genus of fossil plants, closely allied to Lepidodendron, and by some authors considered as belonging to, or being a peculiar condition of, this genus. The leaf-scars of Ulodendron are disposed in spiral order, are comparatively small, and do not vary much in dimensions, not being much larger upon trunks of great size than upon smaller ones. They are either rhomboidal in shape or drawn out at both ends into a spindle-shape. The fructification is a long cylindrical strobile. The characteristic feature of Ulodendron is the existence of a double series of concave disk-like depressions, of large size, round or oval in shape, and increasing in dimensions with the growth of the plant from below upward. These large scars, or disks as they are sometimes called, are arranged in vertical rows, alternating on each side of the stem, and are marked in the center by a small mammilla, around which scales or leaf-scars are concentrically arranged, which become more or less obscure, or are entirely obliterated, with the growth of the plant. The nature and function of these peculiar scars have been the object of much discussion among fossil botanists; but the most generally received opinion is that they were the points of attachment of masses of inflorescence, which consisted of sessile cones formed of imbricated scales in a manner similar to a fir-cone. Ulodendron is a widely distributed genus in Europe and America, and very characteristic of the lower section of the Carboniferous series.

Ulonatæ (ū-lō-nā'tā), n. pl. [NL. (Fabricius, 1793): formation uncertain; perhaps < Gr. αἰλῶν, a hollow, a narrow space.] A group of mandibulate insects, in the system of Fabricius, composed of the genera Acrydium, Gryllus, Truxalis, Forficula, Blatta, Mantis, Acheia, and Locusta: an obsolete synonym of Orthoptera.

Ulophocinæ (ū-lō-fō-si'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. οἰλος, woolly, & φώκη, a seal, & -inæ.] A section of Otaridæ, containing the true fur-seals, as distinguished from the Trichophocinæ or hair-seals of the same family. Also Oulophocinæ. See cut under fur-seal.

ulophocine (ū-lō-fō-sin), a. Of or pertaining to the Ulophocinæ.

ulorrhagia (ū-lō-rā'ji-ā), n. Same as oulorrhagi.

Ulothrix (ū'lō-thriks), n. [NL. (Kützinger, 1845), < Gr. οἰλος, woolly, & θρίξ (τρίχ-), hair.] A genus of confervoid algae, typical of the order Ulotrichaceæ.

Ulotrichaceæ (ū'lō-tri-kā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Ulothrix (-trich-) & -aceæ.] A small order of confervoid algae, typified by the genus Ulothrix. They are aquatic or terrestrial green or yellowish-green plants, each composed of an unbranched filament of short cells that are usually broader than they are long.

ulotrichan (ū-lō'tri-kan), n. and a. [Ulotrichi & -an.] 1. n. A member of the Ulotrichi. 2. a. Ulotrichous.

Ulotrichi (ū-lō'tri-ki), n. pl. [NL., pl. of ulotrichus: see ulotrichous.] One of the two primary groups into which the races of men are divided by Bory de Saint-Vincent, the other being the Liotrichi. The Ulotrichi are those with crisp or woolly hair. The color of the skin varies from yellow-brown to the blackest known; the hair and eyes are normally dark; the skull is dolichocephalic, with a few exceptions among the Andaman Islanders. The negroes and Bushmen of ultra-Saharan Africa and the Negroes are members of this group.

ulotrichus (ū-lō'tri-ki), a. [NL. ulotrichus, < Gr. οἰλος, woolly, & θρίξ (τρίχ-), hair.] Having crisp woolly hair; belonging to the Ulotrichi.

ulster (ul'stēr), n. [Ulster, a province of Ireland.] 1. A type of long loose overcoat, worn by both men and women: originally made of frieze cloth in Ulster. The peculiarity of the coat is that it is cut almost straight for both sexes, reaching very nearly to the feet, and is sometimes girded with a belt; it often has a hood or cape.

Over my shoulders was a drenched Leopard skin, beneath which could be seen my travel-stained, much-worn ulster overcoat. O'Donovan, Merv, xvi.

2. [cap.] Same as Ulster king-at-arms.

Ulster custom. The form of tenant-right (in full, Ulster tenant-right custom) established by custom in the province of Ulster in Ireland, and recognized by the statutes of 1870 (33 and 34 Vict., c. 46) and 1881 (44 and 45 Vict., c. 49).

It is regarded as including the right of a yearly tenant to continue his occupancy so long as the rent, or a fair rent adjusted in view of the value of the land exclusive of buildings, is paid, to dispose of his tenancy to a suitable successor, and to require compensation if the landlord resumes possession for his own use.

ulstered (ul'stēr-d), a. [ulster + -ed.] Wearing an ulster. R. Broughton, Second Thoughts, i. 5.

ulstering (ul'stēr-ing), n. [ulster + -ing.] Cloth for ulsters. Manufacturers' Rev., XX. 237. [A trade-word.] ult. An abbreviation of ultimo.

ulterior (ul-tē'ri-or), a. and n. [= F. ultérieur = Sp. Pg. ulterior = It. anteriore, < L. ulterior, compar. of ulter, that is beyond. Cf. ultra.] 1. a. 1. Being or situated beyond or on the further side of any line or boundary.—2. Not at present in view or in consideration; in the future or in the background; beyond what is seen or avowed; remote: as, what ulterior measures will be adopted is uncertain.

The ulterior accomplishment of that part of it [Scripture]. Boyle, Works, II. 130.

When a thing has served an end to the uttermost, it is wholly new for an ulterior service. Emerson, Nature, v.

II. n. The further side; the remote part. Coleridge. [Rare.]

ulteriorly (ul-tē'ri-or-li), adv. In an ulterior manner; more distantly; remotely.

ultima (ul'ti-mā), a. and n. [L., fem. of ultimus, superl. of ulter, that is beyond or on the other side: see ultimate.] 1. a. Most remote; furthest; final; last.—Ultima ratio, the last reason or argument.—Ultima ratio regum, the last reason of kings; resort to arms or war.—Ultima Thule. See Thule.

II. n. In gram., the last syllable of a word.

ultimata, n. Latin plural of ultimatum.

ultimate (ul'ti-māt), a. [= Sp. Pg. ultimado < ML. ultimatius, furthest, last, pp. of L. ultimus, come to an end, < ultimus, last, final, superl. of ulter, that is on the other side: see ultra.] 1. Furthest; most remote in place.

Looking over the ultimate sea.

Bret Harte, The Two Sh

2. Last; the last of a series of three or more members, especially of a series in which an inquiry is traced from one member to another: as, the ultimate signification of a phrase; an ultimate principle; an ultimate fact. Ultimate applied to the last of a series of events in time, as well as to all series. In special cases it is synonymous with final, except that it implies at least two preceding members, which final does not; and this circumstance gives the idea of a climax and so emphasizes ultimate. But more frequently the ries to which ultimate refers is a regressive one, so that it is quite opposed to final. Thus, ultimate cause means the original cause beyond which no causation can be traced, but final cause is the end toward which action is directed.

Worst is my port,

My harbour, and my ultimate repose.

Milton, P. R., III. 2.

What are we? and whence came we? What shall be Our ultimate existence? Byron, Don Juan, vi.

Those ultimate truths and those universal laws, though which we cannot rationally contradict. Coleridge. [Science] is teaching the world that the ultimate of appeal is observation and experiment, and not authority. Huxley, Lay Sermons, p. 1.

Any great building seems to me, while I look at it, a ultimate expression. H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 1.

There is no doubt a real difficulty here; and the shortest way of dealing with it would be to confess it insoluble and ultimate. W. James, Mind, XII.

3. In entom., specifically noting a stage of the second larva, after the third molt, of those insects which undergo hypermetamorphosis, the blister-beetles (Meloidæ). It succeeds the scarabeoid stage, and is followed by the cecate larva.—Prime and ultimate ratios. S. ratio.—Ultimate abstraction, the consideration of thing in so far as it is described in its definition, with reference to any other circumstance.—Ultimate analysis, in chem., the resolution of a substance into its ultimate elements: opposed to proximate analysis, or the resolution of a substance into its constituent compounds. Ultimate cause, a primary cause.

Mr. Adams had a great mind, quick, comprehensive, analytical, not easily satisfied save with ultimate cause. Theo. Parker, Historic Americans, John Adams.

Ultimate element, an indecomposable element.—Ultimate end, an end to which no other is ulterior.—Ultimate fact, a fact not capable of being explained, rendered intelligible, or in any way subjected to reason: brute fact.—Ultimate principle, a first principle. Ultimate signicate, in nominative logic, an individual signicate, not a universal which, considered as a name has a further signicate.—Ultimate species, a species: a lowest species.—Syn. 2. Eventual, Conclusive, &c. See final.

ultimate (ul'ti-māt), v. i.; pret. and pp. ultimated, pp. ultimated. [ML. ultimatius, pp. L. ultimare, come to an end, be at the last: see ultra, & ultra.] To result finally; end. [Rare.]

Believing that they [the socialistic tendencies of the time] must ultimate, if successful, in an increase of communism and restriction of individual liberty.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXI. 5.

ultimately (ul'ti-māt-li), adv. As an ultimate or final result; at last; in the end or outcome at the furthest point of a series; finally.

ultimateness (ul'ti-māt-nes), n. The state or character of being ultimate; a final or definitive condition.

To have in it a certain completeness, ultimateness, a sacredness. The Century, XXVIII. 6.

ultimation (ul'ti-mā'shon), n. [= It. ultimazione; as ultimate + -ion.] A last offer or concession; an ultimatum.

Lord Bolingbroke was likewise authorized to know the real ultimation of France.

Swift, Hist. Four Last Years of Queen Anne. (Lathan)

ultimatum (ul'ti-mā'tum), n.; pl. ultimatums, ultimata (-tūz, -tā). [= F. ultimatum, < N. ultimatum, a final statement, neut. of ML. ultimus, final, ultimate: see ultimate, & ultra.] A final proposal or statement of conditions; especially in diplomatic negotiations, the final terms on one of the parties, the rejection of which must involve an immediate rupture of diplomatic relations and even lead to a declaration of war.

He delivered to the mediators an ultimatum, importing that he adhered to the treaties of Westphalia and Nijmegen. Smollett, Hist. Eng., i.

ultimē (ul'tim), a. [F. ultime = Sp. último = It. ultima, < L. ultimus, last: see ultimate.] Last; final; ultimate. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 99.

Nothing was wanting now to the perfecting of this language but the ultime and completing act, the solemn consummation by Oath.

H. L'Estrange, Reign of K. Charles (ed. 1655), p. 105.

ultimity (ul-tim'i-ti), n. [< ML. ultimita (-tis), < L. ultimus, last: see ultime, ultimate.] The last stage or consequence. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 98.

ultimo (ul'ti-mō), adv. [L., abl. sing. masc. (se. mense, month) of ultimus, last: see ultime.] In the month which preceded the present; in the last month, as distinguished from the current or present month and all others. It is usually abbreviated ult.: as, on the 12th ult.—that is, on the 12th day in the last month; ultimo being a Latin adjective agreeing with mense, month, understood. Compare instant. a., 1, and proximo.

ultimogeniture (ul'ti-mō-jen'i-tūr), n. [< L. ultimus, last, + genitura, geniture.] A system of inheritance, such as is called in England borough-English, by which the youngest son succeeds to the estate: opposed to primogeniture.

ultimus hæres (ul'ti-mus hæ'rēz), [L.: ultimus, last; hæres, heres, heir: see ultimate and heir.] In law, the last or final heir. Thus, in cases of intestate succession, falling relations of every kind, the succession devolves on the state or crown as ultimus hæres.

ultion (ul'shōn), n. [< OF. ultion, < L. ultio (-n), an avenging, < ulcisci, pp. ultus, take vengeance on, punish.] Revenge.

To forgive our enemies is a charming way of revenge,

... and to do good for evil a soft and melting unction,

a method taught from heaven, to keep all smooth upon earth.

Sir T. Browne, Christian Mor., iii. 12.

ultra (ul'trā), a. and n. [< ultra-, q.v.] I. a. Extreme; extravagant; fanatical: as, ultra measures.

The extreme or Ultra party.

Mūman, Latin Christianity.

II. n. One who advocates extreme views or measures; an extremist; an ultraist.

The "Ultras" would have owned him for their leader, and would have admitted that he went beyond them in the uncompromising consistency of his extravagant dogmas.

Brougham, Hist. Sketches, Burke.

ultra- [< L. ultra, adv. beyond, further, more-over, more, besides, prep. beyond, on the further side, past; orig. fem. abl. of ulter, on the other side: see ulterior, ultimate.] Hence ultra, a. and n., and outrage.¹ A Latin preposition used as a prefix, signifying 'beyond.' (a) Beyond: on the further side of; chiefly with words implying natural objects forming great barriers, boundaries, or landmarks: as, ultramarine, ultramontane, ultramundane. (b) Exceedingly; excessively; beyond what is reasonable, natural, or right: with words admitting of degrees, especially political and polemical terms: as, ultraconservative, ultraliberal, ultraradical, ultracatholic.

ultrabernoullian (ul'trā-bēr-nō'lian), a. Resulting from an extension of the theory of Bernoullian numbers.—Ultrabernoullian numbers, the coefficients of the development

$$n^r = \sum_i A_i r^i (n+1)! / (n+i-r)! r^i!$$

ultracapillary (ul'trā-kap'i-lā-ri), a. In bot., exceedingly slender; composed of exceedingly fine capillary filaments: as, an ultracapillary thallus.

ultracentenarianism (ul'trā-sen-tē-nā'rī-an-izm), n. The state or condition of living to the age of more than one hundred years. Pop. Sci. Mo., XX. 97. [Rare.]

ultraclassical (ul'trā-klas'i-kal), a. Being excessively classical, or classical to an extreme or exaggerated degree: as, an ultraclassical musical composition.

ultraconservatism (ul'trā-kōn-sēr'vā-tizm), n. Unreasonable conservatism; extreme opposition to innovation or change.

ultraconservative (ul'trā-kōn-sēr'vā-tiv), a. Conservative in the extreme.

ultracosmopolitan (ul'trā-kōz-mō-pol'i-tān), a. Cosmopolitan in an extreme or offensive degree. New Princeton Rev., I. 2.

ultracritical (ul'trā-krit'i-kal), a. Excessively critical; over-critical.

ultrafederalist (ul'trā-fed'e-rā-list), n. In U. S. hist., an extreme federalist.

ultra-gaseous (ul'trā-gās'ē-us), a. See radiant matter, under radiant.

ultrage (ul'traj), n. [< ML. ultragium, < L. ultra, beyond: see outrage.] Outrage.

ultraism (ul'trā-izm), n. [< ultra- + -ism.] 1. The principles of ultras, or men who advocate extreme measures, as a radical reform, etc.

New England Senators and Representatives have, from the very idea of their ultraism, little or no direct weight in Congress. Wendell Phillips, Speeches, etc., p. 354.

2. An extreme or radical statement or action.

We would also, in spite of some ultraisms in thought and language, . . . recommend heartily the papers of Dr. Forbes. Dr. J. Brown, Spare Hours, 3d ser., p. 98.

ultraist (ul'trā-ist), n. [< ultra- + -ist.] An ultra; an extremist.

ultramarine (ul'trā-mā-rēn'), n. and a. [= Sp. Pg. ultramarino, < L. ultra, beyond, + marinus, marine.] I. n. 1. A beautiful natural blue pigment, obtained from the mineral lapis lazuli, a variety of halyne. This stone occurs in Siberia, Persia, Tibet, and some other localities. (See lapis lazuli, under lapis.) Small golden specks of iron pyrites are usually scattered through it. To prepare the pigment, selected pieces are heated, and cooled in water, producing disintegration. The powder is then purified by repeated washings, the several wash-waters depositing pigments of different depths of color, the gray powder known as ultramarine ash being the last and least valuable product. Ultramarine is very permanent under all conditions, and is, in color, the purest blue available. Its use is limited, however, by its great cost, and also by the fact that artificial ultramarine is practically as valuable. The color of both natural and artificial ultramarine is a rather dark and intensely chromatic violet blue. The natural ultramarine is only slightly violet, the artificial is very much so. Also called lazulite-blue.

2. Azure-stone.—Artificial ultramarine, the common ultramarine of commerce, prepared by grinding together a mixture of clay, carbonate of soda, sulphur, and rosin: discovered about 1830 by the chemist Gmelin, and now produced on a large scale in Germany, France, and the United States. The mixture is heated in closed crucibles in a furnace for several hours, and slowly cooled. A greenish porous cake is the product. This is the green ultramarine of commerce. The material is again powdered and again subjected to calcination, when upon cooling there results a proper blue color. It has never been determined to what cause this color is due. Certain variations in the proportion of the ingredients produce violet-blue colors. Also French, Guimet, new, and permanent blue.—Green ultramarine, see artificial ultramarine, above.—Native ultramarine. Same as def. 1.—Yellow ultramarine, barium chromate. See barium.

II. a. Situated or being beyond the sea.

The loss of the ultramarine colonies lightened the expenses of France. Burke, State of the Nation.

Ultramarine ashes, the residuum of lapis lazuli after the ultramarine has been extracted, used as a pigment by some old masters as a middle or neutral tint for flesh, skies, and draperies: it is a purer and tenderer gray than that produced by mixture of more positive colors. Fairholt.—Ultramarine blue. See I.—Ultramarine green. See green.

ultramicroscopic, ultramicroscopical (ul'trā-mi-krō-skop'ik, -i-kal), a. Beyond the power of a microscope to make visible; too small to be seen with a microscope. Amer. Meteor. Jour., III. 131.

ultramontane (ul'trā-mon'tān), a. and n. [= F. ultramontain = Sp. Pg. It. ultramontano, < *NL. ultramontanus, < L. ultra, beyond, + montanus, of or pertaining to a mountain, < mon (-tis), mountain. Cf. transmontane.] I. a. Being or lying beyond the mountains; tramontane: opposed to cismontane. Specifically—(a) Lying or belonging to the north of the Alps, in reference to Italy: the sense in which the epithet was originally used. Tramontane is now more generally employed. (b) Lying to the south of the Alps—that is, beyond the mountains as regards the countries to the north of the Alps; Italian: specifically, of or belonging to the Italian party in the Church of Rome, holding the doctrines of ultramontanum.

Ultramontane party, in German politics, the Center party, which opposes legislation supposed to be inimical to the Church of Rome.

II. n. One who resides beyond the mountains; a foreigner. Specifically—(a) Formerly, one who resided north of the Alps; hence, one who maintains the rights of the northern churches, as the Gallican, in opposition to the claims of universal supremacy put forth for the popes; one who is unfavorable to papal claims of supremacy and infallibility.

He is an ultramontane, of which sort there hath been none [no pope] these fifty years. Bacon, Obs. on a Libel.

To the petition of the Bannereis of Rome for a promotion of Cardinals, [Pope Urban VI.] openly avowed his design to make so large a nomination that the Italians should resume their ascendancy over the Ultramontanes. Mūman, Latin Christianity, xlii. 1.

(b) One who resides south of the Alps, or who identifies himself with the Italian party in the Roman Catholic Church, and maintains the doctrine of absolute papal supremacy. See ultramontanum.

To the Ultramontan, holding that the temporal welfare no less than the eternal salvation of men depends on submission to the Church, it is incredible that Church-authority has but a transitory value.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 299.

ultramontanum (ul'trā-mon'tā-nizm), n. [= F. ultramontanisme = Sp. Pg. ultramontanismo; as ultramontane + -ism.] The doctrines of ultramontanes; the views of that party in the Church of Rome which places an absolute authority in matters of faith and discipline in the hands of the Pope, in opposition to the views of that party which would place the national churches, such as the Gallican, in partial independence of the Roman curia, and make the Pope subordinate to the statutes of an ecumenical council. According to ultramontanum, the Pope is superior to general councils, independent of their decrees, and is considered to be the source of all jurisdiction in the church. The Vatican Council of 1869–70 virtually established the views of ultramontanum as dogmas of the Roman Catholic Church.

ultramontanist (ul'trā-mon'tā-nist), n. [< ultramontane + -ist.] One of the ultramontane party; a promoter of ultramontanum.

ultramundane (ul'trā-mun'dān), a. [< L. ultra, beyond, + mundus, world: see mundane.] 1. Being beyond the world, or beyond the limits of the solar system: as, ultramundane spaces. Boyle, Works, V. 140.

These atoms [all atoms in space] he [Le Sage] calls ultramundane corpuscles, because he conceives them to come in all directions from regions far beyond that part of the system of the world which is in any way known to us. Encyc. Brit., III. 46.

2. Being beyond this world, or the physical sphere of existence.

ultranominalistic (ul'trā-nom'i-nā-lis'tik), a. Maintaining that nothing is real but individual substances, and that all resemblances and other relations are words, and nothing more.

ultrapartisan (ul'trā-pār'ti-zān), a. Partizan in the extreme; offensively partizan.

ultra-Pauline (ul'trā-pā'lin), a. Excessively Pauline; rigidly attached to the doctrines of the apostle Paul. The Congregationalist, June 28, 1883.

ultra-Protestant (ul'trā-prot'es-tānt), a. Protestant in the extreme.

ultra-Protestantism (ul'trā-prot'es-tān-tizm), n. Ultra-Protestant doctrines or methods.

A spirit of ultra-Protestantism mingled with and became an animating principle of the opposition which was raised against his [James II.] assaults upon the constitution. Sir E. Creasy, Eng. Const., p. 275.

ultra-red (ul'trā-red), a. Beyond the red: used of the invisible heat-rays, less refrangible than those forming the lower or red part of the spectrum, more commonly called the infra-red rays. See spectrum.

ultra-religious (ul'trā-rē-lij'us), a. Religious in the extreme; excessively religious.

They were all prophetic, Toryish, ultra-religious. Carlyle, in Froude (First Forty Years), II. viii.

ultra-sensual (ul'trā-sen'sū-āl), a. Above or beyond the sensual. Carlyle, in Froude (First Forty Years), II. xvi.

ultra-violet (ul'trā-vi'ō-let), a. Beyond the violet: used of the invisible rays of the spectrum which are more refrangible than the violet, and consequently lie beyond them. See spectrum.

ultra vires (ul'trā vi'rēz), [L.: ultra, beyond (see ultra); vires, acc. pl. of vis, strength, power: see vim.] Beyond one's power; specifically, beyond the legal or constitutional power of a person, court, or corporation. In the law of corporations an act is said to be ultra vires—(a) when it is not within the scope of the powers of the corporation to perform it under any circumstances or for any purpose; or (b) with reference to the rights of members, when the corporation is not authorized to perform it without their consent; or (c) with reference to some specific purpose, when it is not authorized to perform it for that purpose.

ultra-virtuous (ul'trā-vēr'tū-us), a. Pharisaic.

An ultra-virtuous Irish Barney. George Eliot, Silly Novels by Lady Novelists.

ultra-zodiacal (ul'trā-zō-di'ā-kal), a. Passing beyond the zodiac.—Ultra-zodiacal planet, one of the planetoids between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter: so called because most of them have orbits much inclined to the ecliptic.

ultramotivity (ul'trō-mō-tiv'i-ti), n. [< L. ultro (see ultroceus) + motivity.] Capability of spontaneous movement.

ultroneous (ul'trō-nē-us), [< LL. ultroceus, of one's own accord, voluntary, < L. ultro, spontaneously, on his, their, etc., part, lit. on the other side, beyond, further, abl. neut. of ulter, < ulter, being on the other side: see ultra, ulterior.] Spontaneous; voluntary. Jer. Taylor.—Ultroneous witness, in Scots law, a witness who offers his testimony without being regularly cited.

ultroneously (ul'trō-nē-us-li), adv. In an ultroneous manner; of one's own free will. Sir W. Hamilton.

ultroneousness (ul'trō-nē-us-nes), n. The character of being ultroneous; spontaneity.

Ulula (ū'lū-lā), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1817, after Barrère, 1745), < L. ulula, a screech-owl.] 1.

A genus of hoot-owls. It has been variously applied, but is now usually regarded as a synonym of Syrnium. Compare ullet. See cut under hawk-owl.—2. A genus of neuropterous insects. Rambur, 1842.

ululant (ul'ŭ-lant), a. [< L. ululan(t)-s, ppr. of ululare, howl, yell: see ululate.] Ululating; howling; hooting or screeching, as an owl.

ululate (ul'ŭ-lāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. ululated, ppr. ululating. [< L. ululatus, pp. of ululare (> It. ululare, ulolare = Sp. Pg. ulular), howl, screech: see owl.] 1. To howl, as a dog or a wolf. Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 113.—2. To hoot or screech, as an owl.

ululation (ul'ŭ-lā'shon), n. [< L. ululatio(n)-, a howling, a wailing, < ululare, howl: see ululate.] A howling, as of the wolf or dog; a wailing.

If a temporal loss fall on us, we entertain it with ululations and tears. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 415. (Davies.)

There sighs, complaints, and ululations loud
Resounded through the air.

Longfellow, tr. of Dante's Inferno, iii. 22.

Ulinæ (ŭ-lŭ-lĭ-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Ulinā + -inæ.] A subfamily of Strigidae, containing owls of the genus Ulinā and some others.

Ulva (ul'vā), n. [NL., < L. ulva, sedge.] A genus of algae, typical of the order Ulvaceæ, having a flat membranaceous bright-green frond. U. latissima and U. lactuca are sometimes eaten. See green laver (under *laver*2), sea-lettuce (under lettuce), and Enteromorpha.

Ulvaceæ (ul-vā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Ulva + -aceæ.] A small order of fresh- or brackish-water algae of uncertain systematic position, but usually placed with the Floridææ. They have a flat or tubular frond of a bright-green color, composed of either one or two layers of cells. Propagation is by means of zoogonidia.

ulvaceous (ul-vā'shi-us), a. In bot., resembling or belonging to Ulva or the Ulvaceæ.

ulwan (ul'wan), n. [E. Ind.] Plain cloth of the shawl-wool of cashmere, such as is seen in the plain center of embroidered India shawls.

ulyie, ulzie (ŭl'yē), n. Scotch forms of oil. Scott, Pirate, xvii.

um-. [*< ME. um-, umbe-, embe-, < AS. ymb-, ymbe-, embe-, prefix, ymbe, ymb, prep., around, about, = OS. umbi = OFries. um = D. om = MLG. um = OHG. umbi, umpi, umbe, MHG. umbe, G. um = Icel. umb, um = Sw. Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 4956.

umbecast (um'be-kāst), v. i. To cast about; make a circuit.

The hound came fast after, and umbecast about, for she had lost the perfect fawt of the hind.

Sir T. Malory, Morte d'Arthur, III. cxvii.

umbel (um'bel), n. [= F. umbelle = Sp. umbela = Pg. It. umbella, < NL. umbella, an umbel, < L. umbella, a sunshade, parasol, umbrella, dim. of umbra, a shade, shadow: see umbra.] 1. An inflorescence consisting of a number of flower-stalks or pedicels, nearly equal in length, spreading from a common center, their summits forming a level, convex, or even globose surface, more rarely a concave one, as in the carrot. See cuts under inflorescence, Thapsia, and Eranthe.—2. In zool., an umbelliform tuft, cluster, or group of parts, as of polypites borne upon a polypidom. See cut under Umbellularia.—Compound, simple umbel. See the adjectives.—Universal umbel, in bot., a primary or general umbel; the first or largest set of rays in a compound umbel; opposed to partial umbel. A universal involucre is not infrequently placed at the foot of a universal umbel.

umbella (um-bel'ŭ), n.; pl. umbellæ (-ē). [NL.: see umbel.] In bot., an umbel.

umbellal (um'be-lal), a. [< umbella + -al.] In bot. and zool., same as umbellate; specifically, in bot., of or pertaining to the cohort Umbellales. Lindley.

Umbellales (um-be-lā'lēz), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1833), < umbella, umbel: see umbel.] A cohort of polypetalous plants, of the series Calycefloræ. It is characterized by an inferior ovary, crowned with a disk with distinct or partly divided styles, and with the ovules solitary and pendulous in their cells. It includes the 3 orders Umbelliferae, Araliaceæ, and Cornaceæ, the parsley, ginseng, and dogwood families.

umbellar (um'be-lār), a. [< umbella + -ar.] In bot. and zool., same as umbellate.

umbellate (um'be-lāt), a. [= It. umbellato, *< NL. umbellatus, < umbella, umbel: see umbel.] 1. In bot., bearing umbels; arranged in umbels; umbel-like: as, umbellate plants, flowers, or clusters.—2. In zool., having an umbel, as a polyp; umbelliferous; having the shape of an umbel; umbelliform.

umbellated (um'be-lā-ted), a. [< umbellate + -ed.] In bot. and zool., same as umbellate.

umbellately (um'be-lāt-li), adv. In an umbellate manner. De Bary, Fungi (trans.), p. 153.

umbellet (um'be-let), n. [< umbel, umbella, + -et.] A little or partial umbel; an umbel formed at the end of one of the primary rays of a compound umbel; an umbellule. See cut under Osmorrhiza.

umbellifer (um-bel'i-fēr), n. [< NL. umbellifer: see umbelliferous.] In bot., a plant of the order Umbelliferae.

Umbelliferae (um-be-lif'e-rē), n. pl. [NL. (A. L. de Jussieu, 1789), fem. pl. (see L. plantæ, plants) of umbellifer: see umbelliferous.] An order of plants, of the cohort Umbellales, known as the parsley family. It is distinguished by a two-celled ovary forming in fruit a cremocarp consisting commonly of two dry one-celled and one-seeded mericarps or achenes, separating from each other at maturity, and hanging from the top of a slender axis or carpophore. It includes about 179 genera with about 1,400 species, classed in 9 tribes, of which Hydrocotyle, Mulinum, Sanicula, Echinophora, Ammi, Seseli, Peucedanum, Caucalis, and Laserpitium are the types. They are natives chiefly of north temperate regions, especially numerous in Europe and Asia, reaching the arctic zone and mountains within the tropics, also numerous in the temperate parts of South America, South Africa, Australia, and New Zealand. Most of the species are herbs with dissected alternate leaves of many ternate or pinnate leaflets, the petiole commonly dilated into a sheathing base. The flowers are small, usually white or yellow, and borne in simple or compound umbels, generally furnished with a row of narrow bracts forming an involucre or involucre. Each flower consists commonly of five small imbricated petals, as many stamens inflexed in the bud, and an ovary crowned with an epigynous two-lobed disk which rises into two conical stylopodia, each tipped with a distinct filiform style. The fruit is commonly traversed by canals (oil-tubes or vitæ) filled with a liquid or gummy oil of a highly penetrating and characteristic odor. The genera resemble one another closely, and are distinguished mainly by the ridges, the oil-tubes, and the commissure or inner face of the fruit; each carpel bears five primary ridges (juga), and frequently also five intermediate secondary ones, the channels (vallicule) between them often containing oil-tubes. Many are protogynous, or mature their pistils earlier than the stamens, thus securing cross-fertilization. The order is one of strongly marked properties; many umbelliferous plants contain a poisonous, acrid, watery liquid, especially the hemlock (see also Cicuta, Eranthe, and Aethusa). Many species yield stimulating gum-resins, as asafoetida, asadulcia, galbanum, opopanax, and gum ammoniacum (see also Perula, Thapsia, and Laserpitium). Others contain a carminative aromatic oil, and furnish condiments, as anise, dill, caraway, coriander, and cumin. From another group these principles are nearly absent, and the stem or leaf becomes edible, as parsley, celery, and samphire, or the root, as the carrot, parsnip, and skirret. Others are of great medicinal repute, as fennel and species of Eryngium and Archangelica. The order is remarkable for its little resemblance or close relationship to any other except the Araliaceæ, which are, however, readily distinguished by their usually fleshy fruit, often of more than two carpels. Perhaps no other order is so free from variation or from exceptional forms, although in a few genera the characteristic habit is greatly disguised—as in Eryngium, where the umbels are replaced by compact heads; Hydrocotyle, with roundish undivided leaves; and Xanthoxia, with broad and showy white involucres.

umbelliferous (um-be-lif'e-rus), a. [< NL. umbellifer, bearing an umbel, < umbella, umbel, + L. ferre = E. bear.] In bot., bearing an umbel or umbels; of or pertaining to the Umbelliferae: as, an umbelliferous genus.

umbelliform (um-bel'i-fōrm), a. [< NL. umbella, umbel, + L. forma, form.] Forming an umbel, or having its form.

Umbellularia (um-bel-ŭ-lā'ri-ā), n. [NL. (Nees, 1836), from the umbellate flowers: < umbellula, a little umbel: see umbellule.] 1. A genus of apetalous trees, of the order Lawineæ and tribe Liticeæ. It is distinguished from Litsea (the type) by extorse anthers in the fourth row, and forms, in its stamens, a connecting-link to the other chief tribe, Perseceæ. The principal species, U. Californica, the spice-tree (which see), mountain-laurel, or Californian bay-tree, is a tall smooth Californian tree, reduced southward and in the mountains to a small shrub. It has a thick, warty, or nodose bark, with broad and numerous short-pedicelled yellowish-green flowers, each umbel at first included in a caducous globose involucre, and followed by two or two roundish dark-purple drupes. A second species occurs in Mexico.

2. In zool., a genus of deep-sea aleyonarian polyps, having the polypites clustered in an umbel on top of the polypidom, and a long slender stalk somewhat bulbous at the base, as in U. encrinus or U. granlandica. Lamarck, 1801.

umbellulate (um-bel'ŭ-lāt), a. [*< NL. umbellulatus, *< umbellula, an umbellule: see umbellule.] In bot., provided with or arranged in umbellules or umbellets.

umbellule (um-bel'ŭl), n. [*< NL. umbellula, dim. of umbella, umbel: see umbel.] A partial umbel; an umbellet. See umbel.

umber1 (um'bēr), n. [Also umber, formerly also omber (def. 2); < ME. umber, < OF. (and F.) ombre, shade, shadow, umber (fish), = Sp. umbra, umbra, umber (fish), = It. umbra, shade, < L. umbra, shade, shadow, a fish so called: see umbra.] 1. Shade.

Or floures sweete of vyne or other tree
In umber dried may reserved be.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 198.

2. A fish, the grayling. See Thymallus.

Salvian takes him [the grayling] to be called Umber from his swift swimming, or gliding out of sight more like a shadow or a ghost than a fish.

I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 121.

3. The umber-bird.—4. Same as umber, 3.
umber2 (um'bēr), n. and a. [Formerly also umbre, ombre, oumber; < F. ombre (= It. ombra), umber (short for terre d'ombre) (= It. terra di ombra = Pg. terra de ombria), umber, li 'shade-earth' (cf. Sp. sombra de Venecia, Venetian umber; tierra de sombras, umbra), < L. umbra, shade, shadow: see *umber*1.] I. n. A natural pigment somewhat resembling an ocher, but darker and browner, due to the presence of oxid of manganese. It probably originally came from Umbria in Italy, but now the best varieties come from Cyprus. The natural earth is called raw umber. When it is heated to almost a red heat in a furnace, the brown hydrated oxid of iron is changed into the red oxid of iron, and the pigment becomes redder and deeper in color, and is called burnt umber. Both these umberes are very important colors, both for artists and in house-painting. They are permanent, pure in tone, and of great service in making various tints.

I'll put myself in poor and mean attire,
And with a kind of umber smirch my face.
Shak., As you Like it, I. s. 114.

These figures are (at least) as big as the life; they are done only with umber and shell gold, and the shadowed umber, as in the pictures of the gods on the doors of the crum-house.
Aubrey, Lives, Francis Bacon.

Burnt umber. See def.—Raw umber, a highly chromatic but very dark yellow color, like that of the pigment so called. Owing to the small luminosity, it appears greenish, or tending slightly toward olive; but under high illumination it is seen to incline a little toward orange. Its luminosity is about one fourth that of bright chrome-yellow.

II. a. Of a brown color; dark; dusky.

The umber shade
That hides the blush of waking day.
J. R. Drake, Culprits Pay, xxii.

umber2 (um'bēr), v. t. [*< umber*2, n.] To color with umber, or as with umber; shade or darken. Red-ochre rascals umbered with soot and bacon as the English gipsies are. Middleton, Spanish Gypsy, II. i.

Thy dark cloud, with umber'd lower,
That hung o'er cliff, and lake, and tower.
Scott, Marmion, v. Int.

I thought the umbered meerschaum was dearly bought
At the cost of a brain enfeebled and a will enslaved.
O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, v.

umber-bird (um'bēr-bērd), n. The shadow-bird, umber, or umbered, Scopus umbretta, an African altricial grallatorial bird allied both to the storks and to the herons, about as large as the night-heron. It is somber-colored, of a dusky brown, with an occipital crest, lives in the woods, and builds a huge domed nest in trees, in which it lays from three to five white eggs. See cut under Scopus.

umberer (um'bēr-ēr), n. The vizor of a helmet. And then Sir Lamorack kneeled downe and unlaced first his umberer, then his owne; and then either kissed other with weeping teares.
Sir T. Malory, Morte d'Arthur, II. xli.

umbery (um'bér-i), a. [*< umber*² + *-y*¹.] Of or pertaining to umbrage, of the color of umbrage; dark-brown; dark; dusky.

umbilic (um-bil'ik), n. and a. [< L. umbilicus: see umbilicus.] 1. In geom., a point of a surface where the radii of curvature are all equal, and a sphere osculates the surface. The number of umbilics, real and imaginary, on a surface of the *n*th order, is $n(n+2) - 2n + 2$. With the older geometrical terms, an umbilic is a focus; and an umbilic in the modern sense is analogous to a focus.—Conical umbilic, conical point of a surface.

II. a. Same as umbilical.
umbilical (um-bil'i-kal), a. [= F. ombilical = p. Pg. umbilical = It. umbilicale, *< NL. umbilicus (cf. L. umbilicaris; see umbilicus), < L. umbilicus, navel: see umbilicus.] 1. Of or pertaining to the umbilicus; umbilic; omphalic. —2. Formed or placed like a navel; navel-shaped; central.

The Chapter-house is large, supported as to its arched roof by one umbilical pillar.

Dejoe, Tour through Great Britain, II. 335. (Davies.)

Connected through the female line of descent.

The point is interesting, as it relates to the direct lineal ancestress in the female line, or what is sometimes termed umbilical or uterine ancestry, of Queen Victoria.

N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 493.

umbilical arteries, the continuation of the hypogastric arteries in the fetus from the umbilicus to the placenta, ending, with the umbilical vein, the most essential part of the umbilical cord. These arteries convey venous blood from the fetus to be oxygenated in the placenta. See umbilicus.—Umbilical cord. (a.) In anat. See cord, and under uterus. (b.) In bot., same as funicle. 4.—Umbilical fissure, hernia, notch. See the nouns.—Umbilical perforation, the large open umbilicus of certain phalopods, as the nautiloids.—Umbilical points, in math., same as foci. See focus.—Umbilical region. See abdominal regions, under abdominal.—Umbilical ring, a fibrous circumference of the navel, through which the umbilical arteries and veins pass. Same as umbilical ring.—Umbilical sac. Same as umbilical sac.—Umbilical veins (paired at first, usually only one of them persistent), the veins communicating between the placenta and the fetus, along the navel-string, and with the body of the fetus thence to the liver and vena porta et ductus venosus, and consequently between the placenta and general venous system of the fetus. They convey arterialized blood from the placenta to the fetus; at birth they are partly cast off with the navel-string, partly regenerate into the round ligament of the liver.—Umbilical vesicle. See vesicle.—Umbilical vessels, in anat., the umbilical arteries and vein or veins: chiefly allantoic ductures, to be distinguished from the omphalomesenteric vessels of the umbilical vesicle. See cuts under embryo and uterus.

umbilicar (um-bil'i-kär), a. [< LL. umbilicaris, pertaining to the navel, < L. umbilicus, navel: see umbilic and umbilicus.] In math., of or pertaining to an umbilic.—Umbilicar focal contact.—Umbilicar focus, a focus having a real plane contact.

umbilicaria (um-bil-i-kä'ri-ä), n. [< NL. (Hoffman), < LL. umbilicaria, umbilical: see umbilic.] A genus of gymnocarpous lichens, giving name to the family Umbilicariæ, natives of temperate and arctic regions. In times of scarcity some of the arctic species are used as food, as U. arctica, the so-called famine-bread. See lichen, 1.

umbilicariæ (um-bil'i-kä'ri-ä-i), n. pl. [< NL. < umbilicaria.] A family of gymnocarpous parietaceous lichens, having a horizontal foliose blackish-brown coriaceous thallus attached to the substratum at a single point.

umbilicate (um-bil'i-kät), a. [< L. umbilicatus, bowl-shaped, < umbilicus, navel: see umbilicus.]

Shaped like a navel; resembling a navel, as being round and depressed or concave, or as being focal or central, as some pit or depression; umbilicated; umbiliform.—2. Having an umbilicus or umbilicated formation, as a cell or a feather, or marks of the sculpture of a insect; pitted, as a pustule.

umbilicated (um-bil'i-kä-ted), a. [< umbilicate + -ed.] Same as umbilicate.

umbilication (um-bil'i-kä'shon), n. [< umbilicate + -ion.] A central navel-like depression, as that seen in vesicles of Vaccinia or of small-corns; also, the condition of having such a depression.

umbilicular (um-bil-ik'ü-lär), a. [< Appar. intended for umbilicar, < LL. umbilicaris, pertaining to the navel: see umbilicar.] Of or pertaining to the navel; hence, intensely introverted, in allusion to Indian mystics alleged to attain great sanctity by continuous contemplation of the navel.

This change in tone . . . I attribute to a great extent to the new vistas opened up by the school of evolutionists, who the writers who have drawn attention to mere under-contemplation, such as Morris, Rossetti, and Whitman.

umbilici (um-bil-i'kus), n. pl. umbilici (-si). = F. ombilic (also nombrii) = Sp. ombigo = g. ombrigo = It. umbilico, < L. umbilicus, navel, akin to Gr. ὀμφαλός, navel: see navel, and cf. numbles.] 1. In anat. and zool., the more or less nearly central point in the walls of the abdomen where the yolk-bag or umbilical vesicle of the embryo hangs, or where the navel-string or umbilical cord enters the belly; the navel; the omphalos. With the absorption of the yolk-bag or the casting off of the navel-string, the umbilicus remains as a characteristic mark or scar. In man it is a little round pit or depression, its center being hollowed in by the traction of the umbilical vessels inside the belly, as these degenerate into fibrous cords passing to the liver and to the bladder, forming the round ligament of the fœtus and the urachus of the latter viscus.

Hence—2. Some navel-like formation; some circumscribed depression or elevation; a sort of button, or a place in which a button might fit: when elevated instead of depressed, oftener called umbo. Specifically—(a.) In conch., a circular and more or less centric pit or hollow of the body-whorl of a spiral shell; an umbilicated formation. It is well shown in the figure of the snail herewith. (b.) In ornith.: (1) The little pit or depression on the scape of a feather, at the junction of the rachis and calamus, where the vanes begin to grow. (2) The contracted opening at that end of a feather which is inserted into the skin. These are also known as the superior umbilicus and inferior umbilicus respectively, the former being at the top and the latter at the bottom of the calamus.

3. In bot.: (a.) [cap.] An old generic name (A. P. de Candolle, 1801) for the navelwort, Cotyledon Umbilicus. (b.) The part of a seed by which it is attached to the placenta; the hilum. See cut under hilum. (c.) A depression or an elevation about the center of a given surface. Henslow.—4. In antiq., an ornamented or painted ball or boss fastened upon each end of the stick on which manuscripts were rolled.

—5. In geom., a term used by the older geometers as synonymous with focus; in modern works, a point in a surface through which all lines of curvature pass.—6. The raised central boss of a large plateau or dish, often made to fit the hollow foot of the ewer which stands upon it and forms one design with the dish.

umbiliferous (um-bi-lif'e-rus), a. [< L. umbilifer (cus), the navel, + ferre = *E. bear*¹.] Having an umbilicus or navel-like formation.

umbiliform (um-bi-li-för-m), a. [< L. umbilifer (cus), the navel, + forma, form.] Having the form or aspect of the umbilicus; like a navel.

umble (um'bl), a. An old spelling of *humble*³.

Religion umble and trewe also.

Rom. of the Rose, I. 6154.

umble-pie (um'bl-pi), n. Same as humble-pie.
umblest, n.: The entrails of a deer: same as numbles.

This day I had a whole doe sent me by Mr. Hozier, which is a fine present, and I had the umbles of it for dinner.

Pepys, Diary, III. 301.

umbo (um'bō), n.; pl. umbones (um-bō'nēz). [< L. umbo (n-), the boss of a shield, any boss, knob, projection, also poet. a shield; akin to Gr. ὀμφαλός, a boss, elevation, pulpit (see ambo), and to L. umbilicus, Gr. ὀμφαλός, navel: see umbilicus.] 1. The boss of a shield, central in the case of a circular shield. The umbo was sometimes hollow, convex toward the outer side and within allowing the hand to pass into the hollow and grasp a transverse bar; this form occurs especially in small round shields (see bucket); sometimes the umbo terminated in a spike which was a formidable weapon of offense.

2. A boss or knob. (a.) In bot., the knob in the center of the pileus or cap of an agaricoid fungus. (b.) In zool., a small circumscribed protuberance or convex umbilicus; a button-like formation. Specifically—(1) In conch., the beak of a bivalve shell; the protuberance of each valve above the hinge. The umbo represents the apex of a conoidal figure, and is usually a mere protuberance; sometimes, however, it is greatly prolonged into a kind of horn, which may even be twisted or spirally turned. See cut under diatomaria, Plicatula, and Mytilus. (2) In echinodermata, a pore-plate; one of the little elevated ambulacral plates or pieces which are perforated for the passage of pedicels or tube-feet. See cut under ambulacrum. (3) In entom., one of certain movable bosses, each surmounted by a spine, on the prothorax of some beetles, as of the genus Macropus, of Aerocinus longimanus, etc. Kirby and Spence. (c.) In anat., a prominence of the tympanic membrane, or drum of the ear, at the point where the handle of the malleus is attached.

umbonal (um'bō-nal), a. [< L. umbo (n-), a boss, knob, + -al.] Protuberant, like a knob, boss, or umbo; umbonic; umbonate: as, an umbonal formation.—Umbonal area or region, in conch., a part of each valve of a bivalve toward the umbo and within the pallial line; that part of the shell which is delimited by the mantle-margin.

umbonate (um'bō-nät), a. [*< NL. umbonatus, < L. umbo (n-), a boss, knob.] 1. Having a boss or umbo, as a shield or disk of any sort.—2. In zool.: (a.) Formed into an umbo, a boss, or a knob; button-like; umbonal; umbonic. (b.) Having an umbo, as a shell; bearing umbones of this or that kind; umbonated: as, both valves strongly umbonate.—3. In bot., bearing an umbo or boss in the center, as the pileus of many species of Agaricus.

umbonated (um'bō-nä-ted), a. [< umbonate + -ed.] Same as umbonate.

umbonation (um-bō-nä'shon), n. [< umbonate + -ion.] The formation of an umbo; an umbo.

Simple or forked spines, hair-like processes, umbonations, etc. H. C. Wood, Fresh-Water Algae, p. 101.

umbones, n. Plural of umbo.

umbonic (um-bon'ik), a. [< L. umbo (n-), a boss, knob, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to an umbo; umbonal. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 406.

umbonulate (um-bon'ü-lät), a. [*< NL. umbonulus, dim. of L. umbo (n-), a boss, knob: see umbo.] In bot., terminated by a very small boss or umbo.

umbral (um'brä), n.; pl. umbræ (-brē). [< NL. < L. umbra, shade, shadow: see *umber*¹, *umber*². Hence ult. umbel, umbrel, umbrella, umbrere, penumbra, adumbrate, etc.] 1. A shadow or shade. Specifically, in astron.: (a.) The total shadow of the earth or moon in an eclipse; the dark cone projected from a planet or satellite on the side opposite to the sun. See penumbra (with cut). (b.) The dark central part of a sun-spot, which is surrounded by a brighter annular part called the penumbra. See cut under sun-spot.

2. Among the Romans, one who went to a feast merely at the solicitation of one invited: so called because he followed the guest as a shadow.—3. In alg., a symbol which, when paired with another, makes the symbol of a quantity. See umbral notation, under umbral.—Umbral recta, twelve times the cotangent of an angle; umbral versa, twelve times the tangent of an angle. These terms are derived from dialing, and refer to two scales upon an astrolabe.

Umbræ (um'brä), n. [< NL. (Gronovius; Cuvier and Valenciennes, 1846), < L. umbra, a fish, the umbrer: see *umber*¹.] 1. The only genus of Umbridae; the mud-minnows. See minnow. 2 (c), Mud-minnow (Umbrina limi).

and Umbridae. There are two species, respectively of Europe and North America, U. krameri and U. limi.—2. [l. c.] A scienoid fish, Umbrina cirrosa; the umbrine. See cut under Umbrina.

umbraced (um'bräst), a. [< Appar. an error for or misreading of vambaced.] In her., same as vambaced.

umbracle (um'brä-kl), n. [< L. umbraculum, anything that furnishes shade, a shade, shady place, umbrella, dim. of umbra, shade: see umbrä.] A shade; umbrage.

That Tree that Soul-refreshing umbracle Together with our sinne) His Shoulders teares.
Davies, Holy Roode, p. 15.

umbracula, n. Plural of umbraculum.
umbraculate (um-brak'ü-lät), a. [*< NL. umbraculatus, < L. umbraculum, umbrella: see umbracle.] In entom., noting the head when nearly covered by a frontal process which falls over the face and eyes, shading it like an umbrella, as in a few Orthoptera.

umbraculiferous (um-brak'ü-lif'e-rus), a. [< L. umbraculum, umbrella, + ferre = *E. bear*¹.] In bot., bearing an organ or part in the form of an expanded umbrella. See cut under pitcher-plant.

umbraculiform (um-brak'ü-li-för-m), a. [< L. umbraculum, umbrella, + forma, form.] Having the general form of an umbrella, as a mushroom. See cut under Agaricus.

umbraculum (um-brak'ü-lum), n.; pl. umbracula (-lä). [< NL. < L. umbraculum, umbrella: see umbracle.] In bot., any one of certain umbrella-shaped appendages. See cut under pitcher-plant.

umbræ, n. Plural of umbrä.

umbrage (um'brij), n. [< F. ombrage, shade, shadow, < L. umbraticus, of or pertaining to shade, being in retirement, < umbra, shade.

shadow; see umbra, umber 1.] 1. Shade; a shadow; obscurity.

We are past the twilights of conversion, and the umbrages of the world, and walk in the light of God.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 841.

His [Wordsworth's] angels and fiends are human thoughts and feelings, and he can awake them at will from the umbrage of the old Rydal woods.

Notes Ambrosianæ, April, 1832.

2. That which affords a shade; specifically, a screen of trees or foliage.

The linnets warble, captive none, but lur'd By food to haunt the umbrage; all the glade Is life, is music, liberty, and love.

W. Mason, English Garden, iv.

Into trackless forest set

With trees, whose lofty umbrage met.

Wordsworth, Tour in Scotland (1814), The Brownie's Cell.

3. A slight appearance; an apparition; a shade.

Some of them being umbrages . . . rather than realities.

Fuller, Holy War, v. 25. (Encyc. Dict.)

A penitent is not taken with umbrages and appearances, nor quits a real good for an imaginary.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 183.

The opinion carries no show of truth nor umbrage of reason on its side.

Woodward.

4. The feeling of being overshadowed, as by another standing in one's light or way; hence, suspicion of slight or injury; offense; resentment.

I say, just fear, . . . not out of umbrages, light jealousies, apprehensions afar off, but out of clear foresight of imminent danger.

Bacon, War with Spain.

So they parted for that time without the least umbrage of discontent, nor do I hear of any engendered since.

Howell, Letters, I. iii. 23.

The Persian ambassador . . . did not care to see any Franks, the port being very suspicious, and the minister very wisely avoided giving umbrage without any reason.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. ii. 100.

No part of Henry's conduct gave such umbrage to his nobles as the facility with which he resigned himself to the control of favorites.

umbrageous (um-brā'jūs), a. [Formerly also umbragious; < F. umbrageux, shady, < ombrage, shade; see umbrage.] 1. Forming or affording a shade; shading; shady.

A ridge or hillock heavily umbraged with the rounded foliage of evergreen oaks.

Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 733.

Consider but the rudiment of a tall and umbrageous tree, from so minute a seed as may be borne away by every blast.

Evelyn, True Religion, I. 29.

Ash far-stretching his umbrageous arm.

Cowper, Task, i. 311.

Do they play as formerly with thy crisp glossy curls, so delicate and umbrageous?

Landor, Imag. Conv., Alcibiades and Xenophon.

2. Shaded; shady; as, an umbrageous glen.

Umbrageous grots and caves

Of cool recess. Milton, P. L., iv. 257.

3†. Obscure; doubtful, as if from being darkened or shaded; hence, suspicious; "rather shady."

In the present constitution of the Court (which is very umbrageous).

Sir H. Wotton, Reliquie.

4†. Apt or disposed to take offense; taking umbrage.

umbrageously (um-brā'jūs-li), adv. In an umbrageous manner.

umbrageousness (um-brā'jūs-nes), n. The state or quality of being umbrageous; shadiness; as, the umbrageousness of a tree.

umbraid (um-brād'), v. t. [ME. umbrayden, umbrayden; < um + brāid 1. Cf. upbraid.] To upbraid.

Whan she of his falsenesse him umbrayde.

Chaucer, Good Women, l. 1671.

I umbrayde one, I cast one in the tethe of an offence that he hath done. . . . What though he have done a mysse, it was nat thy parte to umbrayde hym.

Palsgrave, p. 766.

umbraid, n. Strife; contention. Halliwell.

umbral (um-bral), a. [< umbra + -al.] Pertaining to an umbra.—Umbral notation, a notation for determinants invented by the French mathematician Vandermonde (1735–96) in 1772, but substantially known to Leibnitz. Each constituent of the determinant is represented as the product of two letters, one for the row the other for the column, which letters do not, of course, denote quantities, but only the numerical position of the row or columns, so that the product of one of one set by one of the other is equal to a quantity. If the umbral multiplication is commutative, the determinant is symmetrical; if polar, it is skew symmetrical. The name was given by Sylvester.

Umbral (um-bral), n. [< L. umbra, shade, twilight, + -al.] In the classification of the Paleozoic series of Pennsylvania, according to H.

D. Rogers, a group of rocks of great thickness, belonging to the Carboniferous, and lying between the Seral or Millstone-grit and the Vespertine. The Umbral and Vespertine together constitute the Subcarboniferous of some authors, or that part of the Carboniferous which lies below the Millstone-grit.

umbrate (um-brāt), v. t. [< L. umbratus, pp. of umbrare (> F. ombrer), shade, overshadow, < umbrā, shade, shadow; see umber 1.] To shade; shadow; foreshadow.

umbrated (um-brā-ted), a. [< umbrate + -ed 2.]

In her.: (a) Shadowed, or casting a shadow.

(b) Same as entrailed. Neither of these uses is strictly heraldic.

Those ensignes which are borne umbrated.

Boswell, Works of Armorie (1572), p. 25. (Encyc. Dict.)

umbratic (um-brat'ik), a. [< L. umbraticus, of or pertaining to shade or shadow, being in retirement, secluded, < umbrā, shade; see umbrā, umber 1. Cf. umbrage.] 1. Shadowy; foreshadowing; hence, casting shadows.

Those umbratic representations (or insinuations) did obtain their substance, validity, and effect.

Barrow, Sermons, II. xxvii.

2. Keeping in the shade or in retirement; secluded; retired.

umbratical (um-brat'ik-al), a. [< umbratic + -al.] Same as umbratic.

Whole volumes dispatched by the umbratical doctors on all sides.

E. Jonson, Discoveries.

umbratile (um-brā-til), a. [< L. umbratilis, remaining in the shade, retired, < umbrā, shade; see umbrā.] 1. Being in the shade or in retirement; secluded.

Health that hath not been softened by an umbratile life still under the roof.

Bacon.

We must not . . . play the geometrician with our soul, as we may with lines and figures, and things obnoxious to our senses, in this umbratile state and dependence.

Evelyn, True Religion, I. 56.

2. Pertaining to or resembling a shadow or shadows; shadowy.

Shadows have their figure, motion, And their umbratile action from the real Posture and motion of the body's act.

B. Jonson, Magnetick Lady, iii. 3.

3. Unreal; unsubstantial.

This life that we live disjoined from God is but a shadow and umbratil imitation of that.

Dr. H. More, Philos. Poems, p. 337, notes.

umbration (um-brā'shon), n. [< L. umbratio (n-), a shading, shadowing, < L. umbrare, pp. umbratus, shade; see umbrate.] 1. A foreshadowing; adumbration.

Nor all this by transient and superficial knowledge, figures, and umbrations, but immediate and intuitive notices.

Evelyn, True Religion, I. 241.

2. In her., same as adumbration.

umbratious (um-brā'shus), a. [Irreg. var. of umbrageous, after umbratic, etc.: see umbrageous.] Apt to take umbrage; tetchy. [Rare.]

Age, . . . which . . . is commonly . . . umbratious and apprehensive.

Sir H. Wotton, Reliquie.

umbrā-tree (um-brā-trē), n. Same as bella-sombra-tree.

umbrē, n. See umber 1.

umbrel (um-brel), n. [< OF. ombrelle, an umbrella; see umbrella. In def. 3 confused with the form umbrere, which is used in the same sense.] 1†. An umbrella.

Each of them besides bore their umbrels.

face, attached to a helmet. Also called shade. See also cut under armet.

umbrella (um-brel'ā), n. [Formerly also umbrello (also umbrel, q. v.); < It. ombrella, umbrel, an umbrella, sunshade, dim. of ombra, shade, < L. umbra, shade; see umbra. Cf. umbricel, umbel, umbella.] 1. A portable shade, screen, or canopy which opens and folds, carried in the hand for the purpose of sheltering the person from the rays of the sun or from rain. The name was formerly given to a sort of fan used to protect the face from the sun, but is now applied to a light canopy of silk, cotton, or other cloth, extended on a folding frame composed of bars or strips of steel, cane, etc., which slides on a rod or stick. A small and light form of umbrella, carried by women as a protection from the rays of the sun often in gay colors, or ornamented with ribbons, lace, etc., is habitually called a parasol. The umbrella has its origin in very remote times in the far East, and some Asiatic countries it was (and still is) regarded as an emblem of royalty or a mark of distinction. In ancient Greece its use was familiar among women for protection from the sun, and it is frequently represented in vase-paintings and terra-cottas. As a defense from rain or snow it was not used in western Europe till early in the eighteenth century. The word is sometimes used figuratively. Compare cloak.

Umbrellæ, that is, things that minister shadow unto them [Italians] for shelter against the scorching heat.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 135.

Umbrello (Ital. Ombrella), a fashion of round and broad Fans, wherewith the Indians (and from them our great ones) preserve themselves from the heat of the sun or fire; and hence any little shadow, Fan, or other thing wherewith women guard their faces from the sun.

Blount, Glossographia (1670).

The tuck'd-up sempstress walks with hasty strides, While streams run down her old umbrella's sides.

Swift, A City Shower.

The inseparable gold umbrella, which in that country [Burma] so much denotes the grandee as the star or garden does in England.

J. W. Palmer, Up and Down the Irrawaddy, p. 90.

Moreover, he [Jonas Hanway] is said to have been the first man who made a practice (about 1750) of using an umbrella while walking in the streets of London.

Dict. Nat. Biog., XXIV. 313.

2. In zool.: (a) The gelatinous disk or swimming-bell of an aculeph, as a jellyfish, by the rhythmic contraction and expansion of which the creature swims, taken either with or without the velum. It is usually the largest, most symmetrical, and most coherent part of the jellyfish, from which other parts hang like streamers, either around its margin or from the center of the under surface. If we compare this bell to a woman's sun-umbrella, lined as well as covered with silk, and having a fringe, then the outer or aboral surface is the exumbrella; the inner or under lining surface is the adumbrella, or adoral surface surrounding the mouth, from which large mouth-parts may hang in the position of the stick or handle of the umbrella; the ring of metal which slides up and down the stick may represent the gastric cavity of the creature, and the metal ribs of the umbrella may suggest the radial canals which go out to the circumference. At points around the margin are the series of adradial, peradial, and interradial sense-organs or other appendages, as tentacles, and where these are long and streaming they represent the fringe of the imaginary parasol. See cuts under aculeph, Aurelia, Discophora, and Willisia.

In . . . [Discophora], the aboral end of the hydranth is dilated into a disk or umbrella, which is susceptible of rhythmical contractile movements.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 118.

(b) In conch. [NL. (Lamarck, 1809).] (1) [cap.] A genus of tectibranchiate or pleurobranchiate gastropods; the umbrella-shells, as U. umbellata. Also Ombrella. (2) A limpet-like tectibranchiate gastropod of the genus Umbrella or family Umbrellidae; an umbrella-shell.

The umbrellas are very large creatures, wearing a flat limpet on the middle of the back, not immersed in the mantle. P. P. Carpenter, Lect. on [Mollusca (1861), p. 58.

The opening door reveals the advent of more umbrellaed and naked-tailed waterfalls.

Rhoda Broughton, Alas, 1.

umbrella-fir (um-brel'ä-fër), n. Same as umbrellapine.

umbrella-grass (um-brel'ä-gräs), n. 1. An Australian grass, Panicum decompositum, whose rib-like seeds are made by the natives into spears. Also called Australian millet. It is a semi-aquatic plant, often tall and stout, capable of thriving in poor soils.

2. The Australian grass Aristida ramosa.—3. A hyperaceous plant of the genus Fuirena.

umbrella-leaf (um-brel'ä-lëf), n. A plant of the Berberidaceæ, Diphyleia cymosa, found in wet or springy places in the mountains of Virginia and southward. It has a thick horizontal rootstock sending up each year a huge, centrally peltate, cutbed and rounded leaf, or a flowering stem with two leaves, flat near the side, the stem terminated by a cyme of white flowers. The genus has but one other species, which clings to Japan.

umbrella-man (um-brel'ä-man), n. A dealer who has a small stand under an umbrella.

I learned from one umbrella man that, six or seven years previously, he used to sell more portraits of "Mr. Edmund Kean as Richard III." than anything else.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 329.

umbrella-palm (um-brel'ä-päm), n. See umbrellapalm, under *palm*².

umbrella-pine (um-brel'ä-pin), n. See Sciadopitys.

umbrella-shell (um-brel'ä-shel), n. A shell of the family Umbrellidæ, and especially of the genus Umbrella; an umbrella. See cut under umbrella.

umbrella-stand (um-brel'ä-stand), n. A stand or holding umbrellas. In a usual form, it has an upright surrounded at a convenient height by a number of rings, through any of which a folded umbrella may be thrust, and a pan at the bottom to receive water trickling from wet umbrellas. Sometimes it has the form of a tree, metal or porcelain jar.

umbrella-tree (um-brel'ä-trë), n. 1. An American magnolia, Magnolia tripetala (M. Umbrella), widely distributed, but not common, from Pennsylvania southward and southwestward. It is a tree of 30 or 40 feet, with irregular branches, and leaves 8 or 20 inches long by 8 or 10 inches broad; these, dating from the ends of the shoots, suggest the name. The flowers are cream-white, 4 or 5 inches deep, unpleasantly scented. The tree is fairly hardy, and frequently planted for ornament. The bark, like that of other magnolias, has the property of a gentle stimulant aromatic gum. Also called elmwood (which see). The screw-pine, Pandanus odoratus, is also called by this name.

2. See Thespesia.—Ear-leaved umbrella-tree, Magdalenia Fraseri, otherwise called mountain magnolia and ear-leaved cucumber-tree, similar to M. tripetala, but having the leaves auricled at the base, sweet-scented flowers, etc.—Guinea umbrella-tree, Hibiscus (Parvium) guineensis.—Umbrella-tree of Queensland, Brassia umbellata, of the Araceæ, a handsome tree 40 feet tall.

umbrella-wort (um-brel'ä-wërt), n. See Oxyphaps.

Umbrellidæ (um-brel'i-dë), n. pl. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1840), < Umbrella + -idæ.] A family of pleurobranchiate gastropods, named from the genus Umbrella. See cut under umbrella.

umbrello (um-brel'ö), n. An obsolete form of umbrella.

umbreret, n. [Early mod. E. also umbriere (also umber: see *umber*¹); < ME. umbrere, oumbriere, < OF. ombratre, ombriere*, a shade, the shade over the sight of a helmet, sometimes attached to the vizor, < ombre, shade: see *umber*¹.] Same as umbrel, 3.

Knelis downe to the cors, and kaught it in armes, Kastys uppe his umbre, and kysses hymc sone!

Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I. 3953.

But the brave Mayd would not disarmed bee,
But onely vented up her umbriere,
And so did let her goodly visage to appere.

Spenser, F. Q., III. I. 42.

umbrette (um-bret'), n. [F. ombrette, dim. of ombre, shade.] The umber or umber-bird. See cut under Scopius.

Umbrian (um'bri-an), a. and n. [= F. Umbrien, < L. Umbria, < Umbri, a people of Italy (see def.).] 1. a. Of or pertaining to Umbria, an ancient region of central Italy, and compartment of the modern kingdom, or its inhabitants or language.—Umbrian school of painting, one of the chief groups of development in Italian art, which assumed a distinctive character toward the end of the fourteenth century, and was preeminent at the beginning of the sixteenth. Among its most notable masters were Ottaviano Nelli of Gubbio, Gentile da Fabriano, the graceful Piero della Francesca, Perugino (the able master of Raphael), Pinturicchio, and the wonderfully facile and gifted Raphael of Urbino, with the many lesser names which cluster about his.—Umbrian ware, a name formerly given to Italian majolica, from the number of factories of this ware contained within the limits of Umbria.

II. n. 1. One of an ancient Italian people who inhabited Umbria.—2. The language of the Umbrians: it was an Italic tongue, allied to Oscan and more distantly to Latin. Its chief monument is the Etruscan tables. See Etruscan.

Umbriidæ (um'bri-dë), n. pl. [NL., < Umbra + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Umbra; the mud-minnows. They are small carnivorous fishes living in the mud, or among the weeds of ponds and sluggish streams, extremely tenacious of life, and able to survive when the water is almost dried up. The relationships of the family are close with the pikes (Esoxidæ). See minnow, and cut under Umbra.

umbrieret, n. See umbrere.

umbriferous (um-brif'e-rus), a. [L. umbrifer, shade-giving, shady, < umbra, shade, + ferre = *E. bear*¹.] Casting or making a shade. Blount, Glossographia (1670).

Umbriina (um-bri-nä), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1817), < Sp. umbrina, < L. umbra, shade, shadow: see umbra.] 1. A genus of scienoid fishes, having the dorsals contiguous, the second dorsal much larger than the anal, vertebrae about 10 abdominal and 14 caudal, lower jaw not projecting, hypopharyngeals distinct, a single barbel, an air-bladder, and two anal spines. The type is Sciæna cirrosa of Linnaeus, now U. cirrosa. Species are found in most warm seas. U. brownsoni inhabits West Indian and Florida waters. U. roncador, the yellow-finned roncador of the Pacific coast, is one of the handsomest scienoids, about 15 inches long.

Bearded Umbriina (Umbriina cirrosa), one fifth natural size.

2. [L. c.] A fish of this genus; an umbra or umbrine.—3. In entom., a genus of dipterous insects. Desvoidy, 1830.

umbrine (um'brin), n. [F. umbrino (Cotgrave), < NL. umbrina: see Umbriina.] A fish of the genus Umbriina; an umbra; specifically, U. cirrosa, known to the ancients, now the corvo of the Italians, ranging in the Mediterranean, and southward along the west coast of Africa. See cut under Umbriina.

umbröse (um'brös), a. [= F. ombreus = Sp. Pg. umbraso = It. ombroso, < L. umbrösus, full of shade, shady, < umbra, shade, shadow: see umbra.] 1. Shady; casting a large shadow or heavy shade. Bailey, 1731.—2. In ornith., dusky; dark-colored.—Umbrose warbler. See warbler.

umbrosity (um-bros'i-ti), n. [L. as if umbrositas* (t-s), < umbrosus, shady: see umbrose.] The state or quality of being umbrose; shadiness. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 1.

umiak (öm'yak), n. [Eskimo umiak, also written omekak.] The native name of the women's or larger kind of Eskimo boat, carrying ten or twelve people, and consisting of a wooden frame covered with sealskins, with several seats. It is used for fishing and for transporting families, and is worked by women. It often has a mast and a triangular sail.

umlaut (öm'lout), n. [G. umlaut, modification of vowels, < um, around, about, also indicating change, alteration (see um), + laut, sound: see loud.] In philol., the German name, invented by Grimm, for a vowel-change in the Germanic languages, brought about by the influence of a vowel in the succeeding syllable: namely, of the vowel i, modifying the preceding vowel in the direction of e or u, and of the vowel u, modifying the preceding vowel toward a or o. Only the former, or the change by a following i (now generally lost or altered), is found in English or German: thus, German mann, männer; fall, füllen; maus, mäuse; fuss, füsse; etc.; in English the phenomena are only sporadic remains, like man, men; fall, fell; mouse, mice; foot, feet. In Icelandic both kinds of umlaut are frequent and regular changes. An English name sometimes used for 'umlaut' is mutation. Compare ablaut.

umlaut (öm'lout), v. t. [umlaut, n.] In philol., to form with the umlaut, as a form; also, to affect or modify by umlaut, as a sound.

We have the umlauted ä (y).

The Academy, March 17, 1888, p. 190.

umpirage (um'pir-ä), n. [umpire + -age.] The post of an umpire; the act of one who arbitrates as umpire; the decision of an umpire; arbitrament.

I gave him the first notice of the Spaniards referring the umpirage of the peace twice between Portugal to the French King.

Evelyn, Diary, April 11, 1666.

umpire (um'pir), n. [ME. umpere, oumpere, oumpere (a form due to misdivision of a numpere as an umpere); prop. nonpere, noumpere, nounpere, nounpier, < OF. nomper*, nonper, later noumpair, not equal, odd, < non, not, + per (< L. par), equal: see *non*³ and *par*², *pair*¹, *peer*².] 1. A person to whose sole decision a controversy or question between parties is referred; one agreed upon as a judge, arbiter, or referee in case of conflict of opinions; specifically, a person selected to see that the rules of a game, as cricket or base-ball, are enforced, and to decide disputed or debatable points.

And if ge think it to many lerned men, take ze one, and he another; and if they may not accorde, ze and I to be umpire, for we stande bothe in like cas.

umzumbit (ûm-zûm'bit), n. [Native name, said to mean 'ironwood.'] A leguminous South African tree, Milletia Caffra, or its wood. The tree grows 20 or 30 feet high; its wood is of a brown color, is very hard and close-grained, and is said to surpass lignum-vite in resistance to wear, and to be impervious to the teredo; it is used for bearings, walking-sticks, tool-handles, etc.

un, n. A dialectal corruption of one. It is common in the southern United States, in the phrases we uns, you uns, a sort of expanded plural, equivalent to we all, you all, which are used in much the same way.

un- [< ME. un-, < AS. un-, sometimes on-, not, = OS. un- = OFries. un-, on- = MD. D. on- = MLG. un- = OHG. MHG. G. un- = Icel. û-, ô- (contracted from un-, on-) = Sw. (a) It is prefixed to adjectives (including participles) and to adverbs, to express simply the negative, as unable, unfair, untrue, unwise, etc., unbending, unyielding, undoubting, unchanging, unthinking, etc., unbent, undoubted, unchanged, etc., 'not able,' 'not fair,' etc. The adverbs or nouns derived from such adjectives or participles (as unfairly, unfairness, etc.) may be regarded as formed from the adjective in un-, with the adverbial or noun formative (< un-fair + -ly, un-fair + -ness), or as formed from such derived forms by prefixing the negative (< un-1 + fairly, un-1 + fairness, etc.). (b) It is prefixed to some nouns to express the absence, incompleteness, or the contrary of what the noun expresses, as in unrest, untruth, unwisdom, undress. Before an adjective in -ing, un- is nearly equivalent to -less after a noun: unresting is nearly equivalent to restless, unchanging to changeless, etc. This negative may be prefixed to any adjective or participle whatever, whether of native or of foreign origin. It is equivalent to its cognate in- of Latin origin, an-, a- of Greek origin, and also to non-, sometimes to dis-, etc., of Latin origin (the Latin forms, in-, etc., being used chiefly before adjectives of Latin origin, but also before other adjectives); thus, uncomplete, incomplete, and potentially non-complete; unelastic, inelastic, non-elastic; unemphatic, non-emphatic, etc.; unreputable, disreputable, etc. As un- may be prefixed to any adjective or participle whatever, it is needless, and it would be impracticable, to include all such formations in the dictionary. In the following pages only such are entered and defined as have had a special development, are used in senses not merely reversing the original adjective, or are in Middle English or Anglo-Saxon use, and so form the basis of all the later compounds, or are for other reasons noteworthy. For the meaning and history of the other forms in un-, see the corresponding simple forms. Of the forms here entered the etymology is usually obvious, and it is therefore not expressly given, except in the older and the exceptional words; the history will be found under the simple form. See also un-.

un- [< ME. un-, on-, < AS. un-, on-, and-, an-, and- (as in on-lucan, unlock, on-leosan, unloose, etc.), a particular use of an-, and-, back, against, = G. ent-, etc.: see and-, an-, a-.] This prefix has been more or less confused with un-, the notion of reversal in the one (AS. un-, on-, etc., 'back') being in many cases practically identical with the notion of negation in the other (AS. un-, 'not'). There are three different senses possible to a form with the prefix in un- and the suffix -ed—e. g., unarmed may mean (a) 'not now armed' (< un- + armed, p. a.); (b) 'not yet armed' (< un- + armed, pp.); (c) 'that has been deprived of arms,' 'no longer armed' (pp. of unarm, i. e. < unarm + -ed). So unlocked, (a) 'not now locked' (< un- + locked, p. a.); (b) 'not yet locked' (< un- + locked, pp.); (c) 'no longer locked,' 'open' (pp. of unlock, i. e. < unlock + -ed); unlearned, (a) 'not learned,' 'ignorant' (< un- + learned, a.); (b) 'not yet learned' (< un- + learned, pp.); (c) 'no longer learned,' 'rejected' (pp. of unlearn, i. e. < unlearn + -ed); etc.] An inseparable prefix of verbs (generally transitive), meaning 'back,' and denoting the reversal or annulment of the action of the simple verb: as, undo, unlearn, unlock, unmake, etc. It is very common as prefixed to verbs made from nouns, implying privation of the object named by the noun, or the qualities connoted by it: as, unarm, uncoil, unrock, unhelm, unhorse, etc., to take off or deprive of one's arms, cowl, frock, helm, horse, etc.; unman, unsex, to deprive of the qualities of a man, of sex, etc. When used with verbs denoting utterance (which cannot actually be reversed or undone), it implies retraction: as, to unsay, unspeak, unswear, etc. Words with this prefix are much confused with words having the prefix un- (see etymology). In the following pages words with the prefix un- are generally so marked, while words with the prefix un- are left without etymological note, except in special cases. See remarks under un-.

[Of the thousands of self-explaining words formed with the prefix un-, some, from frequency or convenience of employment, call for mention though not for definition. A selection of these is given in the following list.]

In the extension of space-construction to the infinitely great we must distinguish between unboundedness and infinite extent; the former belonging to the extent relations, the latter to the measure relations. That space is an unbounded three-fold manifoldness is an assumption which is developed by every conception of the outer world; according to which at every instant the region of real perception is completed and the possible positions of a sought object are constructed, and which by these applications is forever confirming itself. The unboundedness of space possesses in this way a greater empirical certainty than any external experience. But its infinite extent by no means follows from this.

Riemann, tr. by Clifford.

unbounden (un-boun'den), a. [< ME. unbounden; pp. of unbind, v.] Set free; unwedded.

Were I unbounden, also mote I thee, unction (ungk'shun), n. [ME. unction, unxioun*, < OF. unction, onction, F. onction = Pr. unctio, onctio = Sp. unctio = Pg. unção, unção = It. unzione, < L. unctio(n), a besmearing, anointing, < ungere, ungere, pp. unctus, smear, anoint: see unguent, oint.] 1. The act of anointing, smearing, or rubbing with an unguent, ointment, or oil.

It [the welt] glides easily along the metallic warps, requiring no unction, as is sometimes the case.
Ure, Dict., IV. 956.

Especially—(a) Anointing as a symbol of consecration, dedication, or appointment to an important office. The practice of unction in religious ceremonies existed in the Christian church at a very early day, as well as in the Jewish church, and has been continued to the present time in the Roman Catholic, Greek, and some other churches. In Christian usage it includes the unction of catechumens both before and after baptism, of candidates at confirmation, of the clergy at ordination, of the sick, of kings at their coronation, and of various articles dedicated to a sacred use. The practice is not continued in Protestant churches. See chrism, and holy oil (under oil).

Thei make but on Unxioun, when thei Cristene Children.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 19.

The Divine unction of thy Holy Spirit.

(b) Anointing for medical purposes.

Applying only a warm napkin to the place, after the unction and fricace. B. Jonson, Volpone, ii. 2.

He paid great attention to the health of body and mind, using unction and the bath often. Alcott, Tablets, p. 115.

2. That which is used for anointing; an unguent; an ointment; a salve.

With this plaster
 And this unction do I master
 All the fester'd ill that may Give him grief another day.
Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, iv. 2.

Hence—3. Anything that is soothing or lenitive.

Lay not that flattering unction to your soul,
 That not your trespass, but my madness speaks.
Shak., Hamlet, iii. 4. 145.

4. In speech, that quality in the words used tone of expression, or mode of address which excites devotion, fervor, tenderness, sympathy, and the like in the hearer; especially, those qualities which induce religious fervor and tenderness.

Its diction [the Bible's], . . . when temperately and soberly used, imparts an unction to a religious discourse which nothing else can supply.

R. Hall, Review of Foster's Essays.

5. Emotional warmth; gush; specifically, simulated fervor, devotion, or sympathy; counterfeited sentiment; nauseous sentimentality.

The delightful equivocal and unction of the passage in Farquhar.
Hazlitt.

Luring us by stories old,
 With a comic unction told.
Whittier, To my old Schoolmaster.

Unction of the sick, a sacrament or rite in which sick persons are anointed with oil. In the Greek Church it is administered to sick persons whether in danger of death or not. (See exchequer.) In the Roman Catholic Church it is administered only to the former class, and is known since the twelfth century, as extrema or last unction. In this church the body of the sick person is anointed by a priest with consecrated olive-oil, in the figure of a cross on the eyes, ears, nostrils, mouth, the palms of the hands, and the soles of the feet. The oil must be consecrated by a bishop, except in cases of extreme necessity, when a priest may receive especial power from the Pope to consecrate it.

The spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and the fear of the Lord.

Isa. xl. 2.

The power of perception is that which we call the understanding. Perception, which we make the act of the understanding, is of three sorts: 1. The perception of ideas in our mind. 2. The perception of the signification of signs. 3. The perception of the connection or repugnance, agreement or disagreement, that there is between any of our ideas. All these are attributed to the understanding, or perceptive power, though it be the two latter only that use allows us to say we understand.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxi. § 5.

A spirit is one simple undivided active being: as it perceives ideas, it is called the understanding, as it produces or otherwise operates about them, it is called the will.

Berkeley, Human Knowledge, l. § 27.

3. The representative faculty; the power of abstract thought; the logical power. Kantian writers restrict understanding to the operation of abstract thought concerning objects of possible experience.

The inferior unguicorn is the corresponding sheath of the tip of the under mandible. Also called myzotheca.

The ungicorn or dertrotheca is large and strong [in the albatross]. Coues, Proc. Phila. Acad., 1866, p. 276.

unguicular (ung'gwik'ü-lär), a. [< L. unguiculus, dim. of unguis, nail, claw, + -ar]. 1. Of or pertaining to a nail or claw; bearing claws; ungual.—2. Of the length of an unguis or human finger-nail; about half an inch long.—Unguicular joint of the tarsus, in entom., the last tarsal joint, to which the unguis are attached.

Unguiculata (ung'gwik'ü-lä'tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of unguiculatus: see unguiculate.] In the Linnean classification, one of the primary divisions, a subclass or superorder, of the Mammalia, including the four orders Bruta, Glires, Feræ, and Primates, or the edentates, rodents, carnivores, and quadrumanes (including man); correlated with Ungulata, or hoofed quadrupeds, and the cetaceans. [Not now used in any exact classificatory sense, though available as a designation.]

unguiculate (ung'gwik'ü-lät), a. and n. [= F. onguiculé = Sp. unguiculado, < NL. unguiculatus, < L. unguis, nail, claw: see unguiculus.] 1. a. Having nails or claws, as distinguished from hoofs; not ungulate nor muticous, as a mammal; belonging to the Unguiculata.—2. In bot., furnished with a claw or claw-like base; clawed: said of petals; also, ending in a point like a claw.—3. In entom., hooked, as if clawed.—Unguiculate antennæ or palpi, antennæ or palpi in which the last joint is slender and curved, resembling a claw.—Unguiculate maxillæ, subchelate maxillæ, whose lacinia or external lobe has at its apex a slender tooth which can be folded down on the lobe itself, as in the Cicindeliæ.—Unguiculate tibia, in entom., a tibia which has the external apical angle prolonged in a more or less incurved and pointed process: distinguished from the macronota tibia, in which there is a similar prolongation on the inner side.

II. n. A member of the Unguiculate.

unguiculated (ung'gwik'ü-lä-ted), a. [< unguiculate + -ed]. Same as unguiculate.

unguiculus (ung'gwik'ü-lus), n. pl. unguiculi (-i). [NL., < L. unguiculus, dim. of unguis, nail, claw: see unguis.] In entom., an unguis; a small claw or hook-like appendage. Sometimes used to distinguish either tarsal claw, when both claws and the last tarsal joint are collectively called unguis. See unguis, 4.

unguidable (un-gi'da-bl), a. Incapable of being guided.

unguidably (un-gi'da-bli), adv. In an unguidable manner. Carlyle.

unguided (un-gi'ded), a. 1. Not guided; not led or conducted.

A stranger

Unguided and unfriended.

Shak., T. N., III. 3. 10.

2. Not regulated; ungoverned.

The accidental, unguided motions of blind matter.

Locke.

unguiferous (ung'gwi'f'e-rus), a. [< L. unguis, nail, claw, + ferre = E. bear]. 1. Bearing an unguis of any kind: as, the terminal or unguiferous phalanx of a digit.—2. Having unguiferous phalanges or digits; ungulate or ungulate, as a quadruped.—Unguiferous prolegs, in entom., those false or deciduous legs of a caterpillar which are armed beneath with many minute hooks.

unguiform (ung'gwi-fôrm), a. [= F. onguiforme; < L. unguis, nail, claw, + forma, form.] Shaped like a claw; hooked; unguiform.—Unguiform mandibles, in entom., mandibles which are long, parallel-sided, and curved downward, as in the larva of many Diptera.

unguiltily (un-gil'ti-li), adv. Not guiltily; innocently.

unguiltiness (un-gil'ti-nes), n. The character or state of being unguilt or innocent; innocence.

Your conscience knows my heart's unguiltiness.

Chapman, Alphonsus, Emperor of Germany, v. 2.

ungulty (un-gil'ti), a. [ME. ungulty, ungulty (also, with F. term, ungultif), < AS. ungultig, not guilty; as un-1 + gulty.] Not guilty; innocent. Wyclif.

unguinal (ung'gwi-nal), a. [= Sp. unguinal, < L. unguis, nail, claw; see unguis.] Of or pertaining to the unguis, or human nail. [Rare.]

Dr.—reports a case of reproduction of the entire unguinal phalanx of the thumb by a single bone-graft (Pacific Med. Jour.). Pop. Sci. News, XXIII. 143.

unguinous (ung'gwi-nus), a. [L. unguinosus, full of fat or oil, < ungere, ungere, smear, anoint; see unguent.] Oily; unctuous; consisting of fat or oil, or resembling it.

unguistroal (ung-gwi-ros'tral), a. [L. unguis, nail, claw, + rostrum, beak.] Having a nail at the end of the bill, as a duck or goose.

unguirostris (ung-gwi-ros'trēz), n. pl. [NL.: see unguirostris.] In ornith., in Nitzsch's classification, the duck family; so called from the nail at the end of the bill: equivalent to the Lamelliostres or Anseres of authors, exclusive of the flamingos.

unguis (ung'gwis), n.; pl. unguēs (-gwēz). [NL., < L. unguis, nail, claw, talon, hoof, = Gr. ὄνυξ, nail, claw; see nail and onyx.] 1. A nail, claw, or hoof of any animal.—2. A measure of length, about half an inch.—3. In anat.: (a) The human lacrymal bone: so called because it resembles the human finger-nail: more fully called os unguis. (b) The hippocampus minor, or calcar, of the brain. Also unguis avis, unguis Halleri.—4. In entom., one of the curved claws at the extremity of an insect's tarsus. Generally there are two of these on each tarsus, but they may be united; sometimes there is a projection or claw-like organ, the onychium or empodium, between the true claws. The unguis are attached to a very small piece, which, according to Huxley, is a true joint, though the preceding joint is generally called the last of the tarsus: this piece may be expanded beneath into a cushion-like organ, the pulvillus. Some entomologists apply the term unguis to the last tarsal joint, including the two claws, which are then distinguished as unguiculi. The unguis assume various forms, which are of great importance in classification. The two claws may be more or less united or connate, even nearly to the tips. When forming only a slight angle with each other they are said to be divergent, and when spreading widely they are divaricate. They are cleft when each claw is split from the tip so that there is an upper and a lower division; unequally cleft when these divisions are of unequal size; cleft with movable parts when the divisions are movable on each other; bifid when the divisions are side by side instead of one over the other. According to the processes on the lower or concave surface, unguis are toothed when each has one pointed process; serrate when there are several small pointed teeth; serrulate when these processes are fine and bristle-like; pectinate when they are long, slender, and numerous; appendiculate when each claw has a membranous appendice beneath. The claws may be unequal in size; and when they can be turned back on the last tarsal joint they are said to be subchelate.

5. In bot., the claw or lower contracted part of some petals, by which they are attached to the receptacle, as in the pink, the mustard, Cleome, etc. It is analogous to the petiole of a leaf. Also ungula. See under claw.

ungula (ung'gū-lā), n.; pl. unguē (-lā). [NL., < L. ungula, claw, talon, hoof, dim. of unguis, nail, claw, talon, hoof; see unguis.] 1. A slightly hooked or blunt nail—that is, a hoof, as of the horse, ox, etc.; also, a claw or nail of any kind; a talon.—2. In geom., a part cut off from a cylinder, cone, etc., by a plane passing obliquely through the base and part of the curved surface: so named from its resemblance to the hoof of a horse.—3. In surg., an instrument for extracting a dead fetus from the womb.—4. In bot., same as unguis, 5.—5. [cap.] [NL. (Pander, 1830).] A genus of brachiopods: same as Obolus, 3, and Ungulites.

ungular (ung'gū-lār), a. [Ungula + -ar.] Of the character of an ungula; ungual.

Ungulata (ung-gū-lā'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. ungulatus, having claws or hoofs: see ungulate.] In the Linnean classification, one of the primary divisions, a subclass or superorder, of Mammalia, including all the hoofed quadrupeds, the two Linnean orders Pecora and Belluæ (except the elephant and walrus, which Linnaeus placed in Bruta, an order of his Unguiculata). The Ungulata were thus nearly equivalent to the orders Pachydermata, Solidungula, and Ruminantia, and correspond to the modern orders Artiodactyla (the ruminants, pigs, and hippopotamuses) and Perissodactyla (horses, tapirs, and rhinoceroses), together with the Proboscidea and Hyrracoidea, and certain fossil groups, as the Amblypoda. The term, like the correlated Unguicula, has lapsed from a strict classificatory sense, but is still used as a convenient designation of hoofed quadrupeds collectively or indiscriminately.

ungulate (ung'gū-lāt), a. and n. [LL. ungulatus, having claws or hoofs, < L. ungula, claw, talon, hoof; see ungula, unguis.] I. a. 1. Shaped or formed into a hoof; hoof-like; ungulose.—2. Hoofed, as a quadruped, like the horse, ox, etc.; belonging to the Ungulata. See bisulcate, multungulate, solidungulate, subungulate.

II. n. An ungulate or hoofed quadruped.

unguled (ung'gūld), a. In her., having hoofs: noting ruminant animals. The epithet is used only when the hoofs are of a different tincture from the rest of the bearing.

Unguligrada (ung-gū-lig'rā-dā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of unguligradus: see unguligrade.] A division of ruminant ungulates; the ruminants proper, exclusive of the Camelidae; the Pecora unguligrada, contrasted as a series with the Pecora tylopoda or Phalangigrada, the latter including only the camel family. Also Ungulograda.

unguligrade (ung'gū-li-grād), a. and n. [LL. unguligradus, < L. ungula, hoof, + gradi, walk.] I. a. Walking upon hoofs; having true hoofs; cloven-footed, as a ruminant, or solidungulate, as the horse; belonging to the Unguligrada; not phalangigrade or tylopod.

II. n. An unguligrade quadruped.

Ungulina (ung-gū-lī-nā), n. [NL. (Bosco, or Oken, 1815), dim. of L. ungula, claw, hoof; see ungula.] A genus of bivalves, typical of the family Ungulinidae, whose few species are African, and live on coral.

ungulite (ung'gū-lit), n. A brachiopod of the genus Ungulites (or Obolus).

ungulite-grit (ung'gū-lit-grit), n. A division of the Lower Silurian, extending from near Lake Ladoga to beyond Reval on the Gulf of Finland, and characterized by the presence of so-called ungulites (Obolus apollinis), one of the characteristic brachiopods of the primordial fauna. So named by Pander.

Ungulites (ung-gū-lī'tēz), n. [NL. (Bronn, 1848), < L. ungula, a hoof.] A genus of brachiopods: same as Obolus, 3. Also Ungula.

ungulous (ung'gū-lus), a. [L. ungula, hoof, + -ous.] Pertaining to or resembling a hoof; ungulate.

ungum (ung-gum'), v. t. [Ung-2 + gum-2.] To remove gum from; free from gum or a gummy substance, or from stickiness; degum.

When ungummed, bleached, and combed, it [ramie] forms the strong brilliant staple now used in the manufacture of Japanese silks.

Bramwell, Wool-Carding, p. 67.

ungyve (un-gī'v), v. t. [Ung-2 + gyve.] To free from fetters or handcuffs. [Rare.]

Commanded hymn to be ungyved and set at liberty.

Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, iii. 6.

unhabile† (un-hab'il), a. [Ung-1 + habile. Cf. unable.] Unfit; unsuitable.

Puttynge out of their citie their women and all that were of yeres unhabill for the warres, . . . they [the Pettilians] obstinately defended their wiles.

Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, iii. 6.

unhabitable (un-hab'it-a-bl), a. Uninhabitable. [Obsolete or rare.]

We offer vnto yowe the Equinoctiall line hetherto vnknewen and burnte by the furious heate of the soonne, and unhabitable after the opinion of the owld wryters, a fewe excepted.

Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, [ed. Arber, p. 64].

Hitherto they had all the like opinion, that vnder the line Equinoctiall for much heate the land was unhabitable.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 219.

cornis, one-horned, < unus, one, + cornu, horn,

= E. horn.] 1. A traditional or fabulous animal, with a single long horn, the monoceros of classic writers, commonly described as a native of India, but in terms not certainly applicable to any known animal. It is supposed that one of the several large antelopes may have furnished the basis of fact of accounts, since the long straight or recurved horns viewed in profile would appear single. See def. 3.

In that Contre ben manye white Olifantes with outen nombre, and of Unycores, and of Lyons of many maneres, and many of suche Bestes, that I have told before, and of many other hydouse Bestes with outen nombre. Mandeville, Travels, p. 298.

The roots of Mandioca had almost killed them all, but by a peecce of Vnicornes horne they were preserved.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 841.

2. A mistranslation in the authorized version of the Bible (Deut. xxiii. 17, and elsewhere)

of the Hebrew word re'em. This named a two-horned animal, which has been supposed to be the urus. In the revised version the word is translated wild-ox.

3. In her., the representation of the fabulous animal used as a bearing. It is delineated as a horse, but with the tail of a lion and a long straight horn growing out of the forehead between the ears; often the hoofs are represented as cloven. The actual animal most like this bearing is the gnu.

4. The unicorn-fish, unicorn-whale, sea-unicorn, or narwhal, whose enormously long single incisor tooth projects like a horn. See Mon- odon, monoceros, 3.—5. The kamichi or horned

screamer, Palamedea cornuta; the unicorn-bird.

N. Grew. See cut under Palamedea.—6. A kind of beetle having a single long horn; a unicornbeetle. Various large beetles literally answer to this definition, being unicorns, with a large single protho-racic horn. See Dynastes, elephant-beetle, Hercules-beetle.

7. In conch., a unicorn-shell. See cut under

Monoceros.—8. A pair of horses with a third horse in front; also, the whole equipage.

Let me drive you out some day in my unicorn.

Miss Edgeworth, Belinda, xvii.

9. A Scottish gold coin issued by James III.,

James IV., and James V., having the figure of an unicorn on the obverse. Its standard weight was 58.89 grains troy, and it was current for 23 shillings Scotch.—10. [cap.] In astron., the constellation Monoceros.

unicorn-beetle (ū-ni-kōrn-bē'tl), n. Same as unicorn, 6.

unicorn-bird (ū-ni-kōrn-bērd), n. Same as uni- corn, 5.

unicorneal (ū-ni-kōrn'ē-al), a. [L. unus, one,

+ NL. cornea, cornea, + -al.] Having but one cornea, as an ocellus or simple eye of an insect.

The unicorneal ocelli are principally present in larval life. Claus, Zoology (trans.), p. 538.

unicorn-fish (ū-ni-kōrn-fish), n. The narwhal.

See unicorn, 4.

unicorn-moth (ū-ni-kōrn-mōth), n. A North American bomby-

cid moth, of the family Notodont-

idæ, Celodasys uni- cornis: so called from the horn on the dorsum of the first abdominal segment of its larva. Also called unicorn prominent.

unicornous (ū-ni-

unicornis, one-

horned: see uni-

corn.] 1. Having only one horn: as,

Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 19.—2. Extended into but one oviducal process, as a womb. See uterus unicornis.

unicorn-plant (ū-ni-kōrn-plant), n. See Mar- tynia.

unicorn-root (ū-ni-kōrn-rōt), n. The blazing-star, Aletris farinosa. The false unicorn-root is Cha- mebrium Carolinianum (Helonitium dioica), also called devil's-bit and drooping starwort. Its root is difficult to distinguish from that of the former, and some medical virtues are also ascribed to it. Also unicorn's horn.

unicorn-shell (ū-ni-kōrn-shel), n. A gastropod of the family Muricidæ, the lip of whose shell has one large spine like a horn, as of the genus

Monoceros. See cut under Monoceros.

unicorn's-horn (ū-ni-kōrn'hōrn), n. Same as unicorn-root.

unicornuted (ū-ni-kōrn-nū'ted), a. [L. unus,

one, + cornutus, horned: see cornute.] Decorated with one horn: said of a helmet or other object which usually has two horns.

unicorn-whale (ū-ni-kōrn-hwāl), n. The nar-

Unideal works of art (the studious production of which is termed realism) represent actual existing things, and are good or bad in proportion to the perfection of the representation. Ruskin, Modern Painters, iii, 13, § 2.

2. Having no ideas; destitute of ideas, thoughts, or mental action. Johnson. [Rare.]

unidealism (ū-ni-dē'al-izm), n. [< unideal + -ism.] The quality or state of being unideal; realism; lack of imagination; prosaicism.

His popularity is an emphatic testimony to the singular unidealism—I had almost written the congenial imbecility—of the English mind in respect of eternal and divine things. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII, 80.

unidentate (ū-ni-den'tāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + dentatus, toothed; see dentate.] In bot. and zool., having a single tooth or tooth-like projection.

unidenticulate (ū'ni-den-tik'ū-lāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + NL. denticulus, denticle, + -ate¹.] In bot. and zool., having but one denticle. Trans. Roy. Soc. of Edin., XXXII, 637.

unidigitate (ū-ni-dij'i-tāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + digitatus, fingered; see digitate.] Having but one finger or toe; monodactylous.

unidimensional (ū'ni-di-men'shon-al), a. Having only one dimension; varying in only one way.

unidirectional (ū'ni-di-rek'shon-al), a. [< L. unus, one, + directio(n)-, direction, + -al.] In elect., noting currents which flow in the same direction about a circuit.

uniembryonic (ū-ni-em-bri-on'ik), a. In bot., having a single embryo.

unifacial (ū-ni-fā'shal), a. [< L. unus, one, + facies, a face, + -al.] Having only one face, front, or aspect; all facing the same way, as the polypites of some corals; unifarious; second. See cut under sea-kidney.

unifarious (ū-ni-fā'ri-us), a. [< L. unus, one, + -farius as in bifarius, etc.; see bifarious, multifarious.] Set in one rank, row, or series; uniserial; not bifarious or multifarious.

unifiable (ū'ni-fi-g-bl), a. [< unify + -able.] Capable of being unified or made one. S. Lanier, The English Novel, p. 147.

unific (ū-nif'ik), a. [< L. unus, one, + -ficus, < facere, make. Cf. unify.] Making one; forming unity; unifying.

unification (ū'ni-fi-kā'shon), n. [= F. unification = Sp. unificación; < *ML. unificatio(n)-, < unificare, make one: see unify.] The act of unifying, or the state of being unified; the act of uniting into one.

The view of reason here taken is opposed to all such views as would make it consist in the logical principle of unity, a principle compelling us to unify all our conceptions, leading, with Kant, up to the three Ideas of the Pure Reason, God, the World, and the Soul. This unification is sufficiently provided for by the principle of Parsimony, and the facts on which it rests. S. H. Hodgson, Time and Space, § 64.

unifier (ū'ni-fi-ēr), n. [< unify + -er¹.] One who or that which unifies.

That History of Culture itself, which is the great unifier and justifier and purifier of all our teaching. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II, 292.

unifilar (ū-ni-fi'lār), a. and n. [< L. unus, one, + filum, a thread, + -ar².] I. a. Having only one thread: specifically applied to a magnetometer consisting of a magnetic bar suspended by a single thread. See magnetometer.

II. n. A unifilar magnetometer.

uniflagellate (ū-ni-flaj'e-lāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + NL. flagellum + -ate¹.] Having a single flagellum; monomastigata, as an infusorian. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., xi, § 419.

uniflorous (ū-ni-flo'rus), a. [< L. unus, one, + flos (flor-), a flower, + -ous.] In bot., bearing one flower only: as, a uniflorous peduncle.

unifoil (ū'ni-foil), a. and n. [< L. unus, one, + folium, a leaf; see foil¹.] I. a. In her., having but one leaf: noting a plant used as a bearing.

II. n. In her., a leaf used as a bearing; especially, a leaf represented as having been a dufoil, one leaf being torn away.

unifoliar (ū-ni-fō'li-ār), a. Same as unifoliate.

unifoliate (ū-ni-fō'li-āt), a. [< L. unus, one, + folium, a leaf; see foliate.] 1. In bot., one-leaved; unifoliar. — 2. Same as unifoliolate.

unifoliate (ū-ni-fō'li-āt), a. [< L. unus, one, + NL. foliolum, a leaflet; see foliolate.] Compound in structure, yet having but one leaflet, as the orange-tree.

unifolium¹ (ū-ni-fō'li-um), n.; pl. unifolia (-i). [NL. < L. unus, one, + folium, leaf.] A quartic oval having a single depression.

Unifolium² (ū-ni-fō'li-um), n. [NL. (Adanson, 1763), so named because the original species, U. bifolium, was seemingly one-leaved; ML.

unifolium, < L. unus, one, + folium, leaf.] A former genus of plants, of the order Liliaceæ, including Smilacina and Maianthemum.

uniforate (ū-ni-fō'rāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + foratus, pp. of forare, bore, pierce; see foramen.] Having one opening, pore, or foramen.

uniform (ū'ni-fōrm), a. and n. [I. a. F. uniforme = Sp. Pg. It. uniforme, < L. uniformis, having only one shape or form, < unus, one, + forma, form, shape. Cf. biform, triform, multiform. II. n. = D. G. Sw. Dan. uniform, < F. uniforme = Sp. Pg. It. uniforme, uniform dress; from the adj.] I. a. 1. Having always the same form; not changing in shape, appearance, character, etc.; in general, not variable; unchanging.

All human bodies, for example, though each of them consists of almost an infinite number of parts, are perfectly uniform in their structure and functions.

Beattie, Moral Science, ii, 1.

The experience has been uniform that it is the gentle soul that makes the firm hero (after all).

Emerson, Harvard Commemoration.

(a) Not varying in degree or rate; equable; invariable: as, a uniform heat; a uniform motion (that is, the motion of a body when it passes over equal spaces in equal times).

They (temperature observations) appear to go far to establish a nearly uniform temperature for abyssal depths, not far from the freezing-point of fresh water.

C. Wyville Thomson, Depths of the Sea, p. 359.

(b) Having only one character throughout; homogeneous. Sometimes there are many parts of a law, and sometimes it is uniform, and hath in it but one duty.

Jer. Taylor, Rule of Conscience, iii, 6.

(c) Consistent at all times; not different.

If the Creator is perfect, his action must be uniform; anything else would be unworthy of him.

Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 31.

(d) Not different at different times or places: applicable to all places, or to all divisions of a country: as, a uniform tax; a uniform bankruptcy law. (e) Of the same appearance, pattern, or style.

The practice of clothing soldiers by regiments in one uniform dress was not introduced by Louis XIV. till 1665, and did not become general in our army for many years afterward. Harper's Mag., LXXX, 333.

2. Of the same form or character with others; agreeing with each other; conforming to one rule or mode.

The only doubt is about the manner of their unity, how far churches are bound to be uniform in their ceremonies.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

Uniform acceleration. See acceleration (b). — Uniform current. A continuous current of constant strength. — Uniform extension, field, function, sandipert, symmetry, etc. See the nouns. — Uniform strain. Same as homogeneous strain (which see, under strain). = Syn. Unvarying, unchanging, alike, regular, constant, undeviating, consistent.

II. n. A dress of the same kind, fabrics, fashion, or general appearance as others worn by the members of the same body, whether military, naval, or any other, by which the members may be recognized as belonging to the particular body: opposed to plain clothes, or ordinary civil dress: as, the uniform of a soldier, a sailor, or a policeman.

The uniforms in the army were plain and serviceable; the most picturesque being that of the Grenadiers, who, Evelyn says, were first introduced in 1678.

Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, II, 202.

The proposed uniform, sir, of the Pickwick Club.

Dickens.

uniform (ū'ni-fōrm), v. t. [< uniform, a.] 1. To make uniform; reduce to uniformity. Sir I. Sidney.

The more than Protean travesties which words underwent before they were uniformed by Johnson and Walker.

Lovell, Study Windows, p. 351.

2. To clothe with or as if with a uniform.

This was the first flag bearing the state arms, and was carried by the first uniformed company of militia in the State [Michigan].

Preble, Hist. Flag, p. 642.

uniformal (ū-ni-fōr'mal), a. [< uniform + -al.] Uniform; symmetrical.

Her comely nose with uniformal grace, Like pure white, stands in the middle place.

Herrick, Appendix, p. 433.

uniformitarian (ū-ni-fōr-mi-tā'ri-an), a. and n. [< uniformity + -arian.] I. a. Of or pertaining to uniformity or the doctrine of uniformity. See the noun.

The catastrophist and the uniformitarian opinions.

Whewell, Hist. of Scientific Ideas, II, 289.

The uniformitarian theories of Sir Charles Lyell were regarded as heresies by many.

Westminster Rev., CXXVI, 544.

II. n. One who upholds a system or doctrine of uniformity; specifically, in geol., one who advocates the theory that causes now active in bringing about geological changes have always been similar in character and intensity, or, in other words, that there has been no essential change in the character of geological events: during the lapse of the geological ages: the opposite of catastrophist.

The Catastrophist constructs Theories, the Uniformitarian demolishes them. The former adduces evidence of an origin, the latter explains the evidence away.

Whewell, Philos. of Inductive Sciences, I, p. xxxvi.

uniformitarianism (ū-ni-fōr-mi-tā'ri-an-izm), n. [< uniformitarian + -ism.] The theory advocated by uniformitarians: the opposite of catastrophism. See catastrophe, 3, and catastrophism.

The changes of the past must be investigated in the light of similar changes now in operation. This was the guiding principle of the Scottish School. . . . though under the name of Uniformitarianism it has unquestionably been pushed to an unwarrantable length by some of its later followers of Hutton. Gekie, Geol. Sketches, p. 233.

uniformity (ū-ni-fōr'mi-ti), n. [= F. uniformité = Sp. uniformidad = Pg. uniformidade = It. uniformità, < LL. uniformita(t)-s, uniformity < L. uniformis, uniform: see uniform.] The state or character of being uniform, in any sense; absence of variation or difference. (a) Maintenance of the same character, course, plan, law, etc.; sameness; consistency.

There is no uniformity in the design of Spenser; he aims at the accomplishment of no one action. Dryden.

Queen Elizabeth was remarkable for that steadiness and uniformity which ran through all her actions.

Addison.

How far away is the doctrine of uniformity [in nature from fatalism! It begins directly to remind us that we suffer from preventible evils, that the people perish for lack of knowledge.

W. K. Clifford, Lect., II, 263.

We see that only as fast as the practice of the arts develop the idea of measure can the consciousness of uniformity become clear.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol. (2d ed.), § 498.

(b) Conformity among several or many to one pattern plan, rule, etc.; resemblance, consonance, or agreement as, the uniformity of different churches in ceremonies or rites.

Houses are built to live in, and not to look on; therefore let us be preferred before uniformity, except where both may be had.

Bacon, Building.

Such is the uniformity of almost all the houses of the same streets . . . that they are made alike both in proportion of workmanship and matter.

Coryat, Crudities, I, 80.

The skilful campaign by which the triumph of the Reformation and of uniformity was secured.

R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xv.

(c) Continued or unvaried sameness or likeness; monotony.

Uniformity must tire at last, though it is a uniformity of excellence.

Johnson.

Acts of Uniformity. See act.

uniformize (ū'ni-fōrm-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. uniformized, ppr. uniformizing. [< uniform + -ize.] To make uniform; unify. [Rare.]

The other Congress expressed a similar wish for the formation of . . . an International Commission to fix units and uniformize methods.

Nature, XL, 563.

uniformly (ū'ni-fōrm-li), adv. In a uniform manner; with uniformity; evenly; invariably.

In a light drab he uniformly dressed.

Crabbe, Tales (Works, IV, 136).

No assigned nor any conceivable attribute of the supposed archetypal vertebra is uniformly maintained.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol. (Am. ed. 1872), § 210.

When the simultaneous values of a quantity for different bodies or places are equal, the quantity is said to be uniformly distributed in space.

Clerk Maxwell, Matter and Motion, xxiii., foot-note.

Uniformly accelerated motion. See acceleration (b). — Uniformly retarded motion. See retard.

uniformness (ū'ni-fōrm-nes), n. The state or character of being uniform; uniformity. Berkeley.

unifoveate (ū-ni-fō'vē-āt), a. [< L. unus, one + fovea, a small pit; see foveate.] In entom. having a single fovea.

unify (ū'ni-fi), v.; pret. and pp. unified, ppr. unifying. [< F. unifier = Sp. unificar = It. unificare, < ML. unificare, make one, < L. unus, one + facere, make: see -fy. Cf. unific.] I. trans. To form into one; make a unit of; reduce to unity or uniformity.

Perception is thus a unifying act. Sir W. Hamilton Unless we succeed in finding a rationale of this universal metamorphosis, we obviously fall short of that completely unified knowledge constituting philosophy.

H. Spencer, First Principles, p. 207.

II. intrans. To produce unity or uniformity. These Homerides were not the only authors of epigrams, but they had the great advantage over other epigrammers that they were a genus, and that they worked continuously from generation to generation on the same poems, adding and unifying, and so they produced the epics which have outlived all others.

Classical Rev., II, 256.

unigenital (ū-ni-jen'ī-tal), a. [< L. unigenitus, only-begotten, < L. unus, one, + genitus, gotten: see genital.] Only-begotten.

unigeniture (ū-ni-jen'ī-tūr), n. [< L. unigenitus, only-begotten (see unigenital), + -ure.] The state of being the only-begotten. Bp. Pearson.
unigenitus (ū-ni-jen'ī-tus), n. [NL., so called from the first word ("Unigenitus Dei Filius," etc.); see unigenital.] A bull promulgated by Pope Clement XI. in 1713, and directed against Unitarianism. It commenced with the words "Unigenitus Dei Filius," and condemned 101 propositions taken from Quesnel's "Réflexions Morales sur le Nouveau Testament."

unigenous (ū-nij'e-nus), a. [< L. unigena, only-begotten, born of one parent or of one family kind, < unus, one, + gignere, beget. Cf. unimortal.] Of one and the same kind; homogeneous.

uniglobular (ū-ni-glob'ū-lār), a. Having or consisting of a single globular part or formation. Geol. Jour., XLVII. 6.

unijugate (ū-ni-jō'gāt), a. [< L. unijugus, having one yoke (< unus, one, + jugum, yoke), + -ate.] In bot., having but a single pair of leaflets: said of a pinnate leaf.

unijugous (ū-ni-jō'gus), a. In bot., same as unijugate.

unilabiate (ū-ni-lā'bi-āt), a. [< L. unus, one, + labium, lip, + -ate.] Having a single lip or lip-like part: said in entomology of orifices with a single fleshy lip on one side, by which they can be closed.

unilamellate (ū-ni-lam'e-lāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + NL. lamella + -ate.] Having one lamella or layer; unilaminar.

unilaminar (ū-ni-lam'ī-nār), a. [< L. unus, one, + lamina, lamina, + -ar.] Having one lamina; one-layered; single-layered.

unilaminatē (ū-ni-lam'ī-nā), a. Same as unilaminar.

unilateral (ū-ni-lat'e-ral), a. [< L. unus, one, + latus (later-), side, + -ate.] 1. One-sided; 2. or pertaining to one side only.

We note that, although unilateral movements (the more ordinary) are lost, the more automatic (the bilateral) are retained. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXV. 175.

Certain hallucinations, as is well known, are unilateral, i. e. are perceived when (say) the right eye or ear is acting, but cease when that action is obstructed, though the eye or ear is free. Mind, X. 170.

Unilateral lesions. Princeton Rev., July, 1879, p. 106.

2. In bot., one-sided; either originating on one side of an axis or all turned to one side, as the flowers of a unilateral raceme.—3. Placed on one side only of a surface; unifacial; as a set of polypites.—Unilateral bond or contract, one which binds one party only.—Unilateral leaves, leaves which lean toward one side of the stem, as in Convolvulus multiflorus.—Unilateral raceme, a raceme whose flowers grow only on one side of the common peduncle.

Unilaterality (ū-ni-lat'e-ral'ī-ti), n. [< unilateral + -ity.] The character or state of being unilateral.

This unilaterality is insisted on by Salesbury. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 387.

Unilaterally (ū-ni-lat'e-ral-i), adv. In a unilateral manner; one-sidedly.

The destruction of the occipito-angular region is incomplete. Unilaterality or bilaterality. Lancet, No. 3485, p. 1291.

He recognized thankfully that the government had abandoned the pretension to settle ecclesiastical affairs unilaterally. Contemporary Rev., XLX. 282.

unilateral (ū-ni-lit'e-ral), a. [< L. unus, one, + litera, littera, letter: see literal.] Consisting of a single letter: as, Y is the unilateral letter of some alphabets.

unilluminated (un-i-lūm'd), a. Not illuminated; not lighted up.

And her full eye, now bright, now unilluminated, spoke more than Woman's thought.

Cleridge, Destiny of Nations. (Daries.)

unilluminated (un-i-lū'mi-nā-ted), a. 1. Not illuminated; not lighted; dark.

The outer or "sporting" door was of course wide open; passing through an interior one of green balze, I blundered up a narrow and totally unilluminated passage.

C. A. Bristed, English University, p. 78.

2. Ignorant.

unilobed (ū-ni-lō'b), a. [< L. unus, one, + NL. lobus, lobe, + -ad.] Same as unilobed.

unilobed (ū-ni-lōbd), a. [< L. unus, one, + NL. lobus, lobe, + -ed.] In entom., having a single lobe: especially noting the maxillæ of certain insects.

unilocular (ū-ni-lok'ū-lār), a. [< L. unus, one, + locus, compartment, + -ar.] In bot., zoöl., and pathol., having but one locus, cavity, or compartment; single-chambered; monothalamous, as a foraminifer; uniloculate: as, a unilocular pericarp or anther; a unilocular heart or shell: correlated with bilocular, trilocular, quadrilocular, and multilocular or plurilocular. Also monolocular.

uniloculate (ū-ni-lok'ū-lāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + locus, compartment, + -ate.] Same as unilocular.

unimaginable (un-i-maj'ī-nā-bl), a. Not imaginable; not capable of being imagined, conceived, or thought of.

Things to their thought
So unimaginable as hate in heaven.
Milton, P. L., vii. 54.

On every side now rose Rocks which in unimaginable forms
Lifted their black and barren pinnacles.
Shelley, Alastor.

unimaginableness (un-i-maj'ī-nā-bl-nes), n. The character of being unimaginable; inconceivableness. Dr. H. More.

unimaginably (un-i-maj'ī-nā-bl), adv. In an unimaginable manner; inconceivably. Boyle.

unimaginativeness (un-i-maj'ī-nā-tiv-nes), n. The character of being unimaginative.

Tom was in a state of as blank unimaginativeness concerning the cause and tendency of his sufferings as if he had been an innocent shrewmouse imprisoned in the split trunk of an ash tree in order to cure lameness in cattle.
George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, II. 1.

unimagined (un-i-maj'ind), a. Not imagined or conceived.

Unimagined bliss. Thomson, Liberty, iii.

To a long low coast with beaches and heads
That run through unimagined mazes.
Lovell, Appledore.

unimitable (un-im'ī-tā-bl), a. Inimitable.

Thou art all unimitable.
Beau. and Fl., Laws of Candy, i. 2.

unimmortal (un-i-mōr'tal), a. Not immortal; mortal. Milton, P. L., x. 611.

unimodular (ū-ni-mod'ū-lār), a. [< L. unus, one, + NL. modulus, modulus, + -ar.] Having only one modulus.—Unimodular transformation, in alg., a transformation whose modulus is equal to unity.

unimpaired (un-im-pārd'), a. Not impaired, in any sense.

My strength is unimpaired. Couper, Odyssey, xxi.

unimpassioned (un-im-pash'ond), a. Not impassioned; not moved or actuated by passion; uninfluenced by passion; calm; tranquil.

He [Anselm] was exiled; he returned the same meek, unoffending, unimpassioned man.
Milman.

Such small unimpassioned revenges have an enormous effect in life.
George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, III. 7.

unimpeachability (un-im-pē'cha-bil'ī-ti), n. The character of being unimpeachable, or not open to objection or criticism; blamelessness.

Contemporary Rev., LIV. 343.

unimpeachable (un-im-pē'cha-bl), a. Not impeachable; not capable of being impeached, accused, censured, or called in question; free from guilt, stain, or fault; blameless; irrefragable.

The unimpeachable integrity and piety of many of the promoters of this petition renders those aspersions as idle as they are unjust.

Burke, Speech on the Acts of Uniformity.

two-edged spikelets, each with the three to six long glumes empty. There are 5 species, all North America one (U. paniculata) extending into Central and South America. U. racemiflora of the West Indies differs in minute spikelets. The others are tall erect grasses growing in tufts from strong creeping rootstocks. The leaves are broad and flat, or convolute; the panicle loose, dense, or, in U. gracilis, contracted and wand-like, and U. racemiflora forming one-sided spikes. In U. paniculata, a tall species reaching 8 feet, and U. latifolia, a shorter plant with drooping long-pediced flowers, the spikelets reach an unusually large size, sometimes 2 inches long and with 30 flowers. U. latifolia and U. gracilis are pasture-grasses; U. paniculata is valuable from its bluish sea-sands. See spike-grass.

union (ū-'nyon), n. and a. [< F. union = Sp. unión = Pg. uniao = It. unione, < LL. unio(n-), i., oneness, unity, the number one, a uniting, union U. unio(n-), m., a single large pearl, a single onion (> ult. E. onion), < unus, one: see one. C. unite, etc.] I. n. 1. The act of joining two or more things into one, and thus forming compound body or a mixture; the state of being united; junction; coalition; combination; as, the union of soul and body.

So we grew together.
Like to a double cherry, seeming parted,
But yet an union in partition. Shak., M. N. D., iii. 2. 21.

in the temper of Bacon". . . there was a singular union of modesty and sobriety.

In zool., anat., and bot.: (a) The state of use and immediate connection of parts, organs, or tissues, especially of like parts, or the process of becoming so united; a growing together or its result, as in the different cases of myophysis, synostosis, synchondrosis, ankylosis, confluence, conrescence, coalescence, conation, anastomosis, syzygy, zygotis, and the like. See the distinctive words. (b) The connection of two or several individuals in a compound organism, as of several zooids in a zoothecium.—3. lay a foundation for a blessed Union among our selves, which would frustrate the great design of our enemies on us.

Now, when a mutual Flame you have revealed,
And the dear Union of our Souls is seal'd.

Self-love and social at her birth began;
Union the bond of all things, and of man.
Pope, Essay on Man, III. 149.

That which is united or made into one; something formed by a combination of various parts or individual things or persons; an aggregate of united parts; a coalition; a combination; a confederation; a league.

An amalgamation of the Christian religious unions was effected with the sacrificial societies of the pagans.

English Guilds (E. E. T. S.), p. lxxiii.
A confederacy of two or more nations, or of the various states of a nation: in this sense the United States of America is sometimes called by way of preeminence "The union." (b) In England and Ireland, two or more parishes ecclesiastically united for the better administration of the parishes. It is in the discretion of the Local Government and to consolidate any two or more parishes into one under a single board of guardians elected by the owners and ratepayers of the component parishes. Each union has a common workhouse, and all the cost of the relief of the poor is charged upon the common fund. (c) Two or more parishes or contiguous benefices consolidated into one for ecclesiastical purposes. (d) An association of independent churches, generally either Congregational or Baptist, for the purpose of promoting mutual fellowship and cooperation in Christian work. It differs from most ecclesiastical bodies in possessing no authority over the churches which unite in it. (e) A permanent combination among workmen engaged in the same occupation or trade.

In old days if here and there a clergyman, a professional man, a politician, or a writer, ventured to raise a voice on behalf of the Unions, he was assailed with a storm of ridicule and abuse.

Nineteenth Century, XXVI. 722.
A union workhouse; a workhouse erected and maintained at the joint expense of parishes which have been formed into a union: in Scotland called a combination poor-house.

The poor old people that they bring up in the Unions.
Dickens, Our Mutual Friend, II. 284.

That part of a flag which occupies the upper corner next the staff when it is distinguished from the rest in color or pattern, as in the flag of the United States, where it is blue with white stars, or in the flag of Great Britain; the jack. When the flag is hoisted on the staff with the union below, it is considered a signal of distress. See union down, below.

3. A flag showing the union only. See union flag and union jack, below.—9. A joint, screw, or other connection uniting parts of machinery, or the like; a kind of coupling for connecting tubes together.—10. A textile fabric of several materials, or of different kinds of thread.

Then we had an Irish linen, an imitation, you know, a sort of Union, which we call double twist. It is made, I believe, in Manchester, and is a mixture of linen and cotton. Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 420.

11. A shallow vat or tray in which partly fermented beer is kept to complete its fermentation or to cleanse itself.—12. A large fine pearl.

In the cup an union shall he throw,
Richer than that which four successive kings
In Denmark's crown have worn.

Shak., Hamlet, v. 2. 283.
Sibthelmus bishop of Schirbrune . . . traualled through Fudra, and returning home brought with him many strange and precious unions and costly spyes.

Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 5.
Many says that the name unio was an invention of the gentlemen of Rome, to denote only such pearls as will not be matched.

Nares.
Act of Union, the name by which several statutes constituting the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland are known. (a) A statute of 1535-6, enacting the political union of Wales to England. (b) A statute of 1706, uniting the kingdoms of England and Scotland and on after May 1st, 1707. (c) A statute of 1800, which united the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland and after January 1st, 1801.—Apperceptive union. See apperceptive.—Bony union, in surg., the knitting of a fracture by callus: opposed to ligamentous union.—Customs union. See customs-union and Zollverein.—Evangelical, hypostatic, Latin, liberal union. See the adjectives.—Liberties' Union Act. See liberty.—Union Assessment Acts. See assessment.—Union by first intention, in surg., the healing of a wound without suppuration.—Union by second intention, in surg., the healing of a wound by granulation after suppuration.—Union churches, a body of Protestant evangelical Christians organized in its present form about 1868. It recognizes no creed except allegiance to the Bible, no test of membership except character, and no ecclesiastical authority superior to that of membership in the local church. Its membership is mainly confined to the Western States in the United States.—Union down, said of a flag displaying the union at the bottom instead of in its normal position at the top. A flag hoisted in this position forms a signal of distress.—Union flag, the union jack, or national flag of the United Kingdom. The national flag of England was the banner of St. George (heraldically described as argent, a cross gules), and soon after the union of the crowns this was united with the Scottish national flag, or banner of St. Andrew (in the language of heraldry, azure, a saltier argent), thus forming the first union flag. On the legislative union with Scotland in 1707 a new design for the national or union flag was adopted, described in heraldic terms as azure, a saltier argent surmounted by a cross gules fimbriated or edged of the second. On the union with Ireland the red cross or saltier of St. Patrick was introduced, and as thus modified the flag now exists.—Union jack, the national ensign of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, formed by the union of the cross of St. George (red on a white ground), the diagonal cross or saltier of St. Andrew (white on a blue ground), and the diagonal cross or saltier of St. Patrick (red on a white ground).—Universal Postal Union. See postal.—Syn. 1-3. Union, Unity, Junction, Connection. Union is the act of bringing two or more together so as to make but one: as, the union of the Mississippi and the Missouri; union in marriage; or it is the state resulting, or the product of the act, as, the American Union. Unity is only the state of oneness, whether there has or has not been previous distinctness: as, the unity of God, the unity of faith, unity of feeling, interest, labor. Junction expresses not simply collocation, but a real and physical bringing into one. Union and junction differ from connection in that the last does not necessarily imply contact: there may be connection between houses by a portico or walk. It is literal to speak of the connection, and figurative to speak of the union, of England and America by a telegraphic cable.

II. a. Of or pertaining to a union or to the Union (see I. 5 (a)); in favor of the Union: as, the Union party; Union principles; Union sympathies.—Union Labor party, in U. S. politics, a political party formed in 1887, which drew support from the Greenbackers, farmers' organizations, Knights of Labor, etc. It nominated a candidate for President of the United States in 1888.—Union man. (a) In the United States, in the period of the civil war, an opponent of secession and upholder of the federal cause. (b) A member of a trade-union.—Union party, a party which favors the formation or preservation of a union; specifically, the Constitutional Union party. See constitutional.

ligament, and variable hinge (thus including the Mutellidae and Mycetozoidae). (c) Further restricted to the Unioninae. (d) In the narrowest sense the Unionidae are nearly one thousand species, of most parts of the world, but especially numerous and diversified in the United States, where they are mostly called fresh-water mussels or clams.

unioniform (ū-ni-on'ī-fōrm), a. [< NL. Unio (n) + L. forma, form.] Like a union in shape or aspect; resembling or related to the Unionidae. Also unionoid.

Unioninæ (ū'ni-ō-ni'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Unio (n) + -inæ.] The leading subfamily of Unionidae, variously limited. (a) Including all those unions whose branchial orifice is confluent with the pedal, and whose anal siphon is little prolonged. (b) Restricted to such as have the foot compressed and securiform (thus contrasting with Mycetozoidæ): same as Unionidae (c).

unionine (ū'ni-ō-nin), a. Of or pertaining to the Unioninæ; unioniform in a narrow sense.

unionism (ū'nyon-izm), n. [< union + -ism]. 1. The principle of uniting or combining; specifically, trade-unionism.

I apprehend that the notion which lies at the bottom of Unionism is this: that a man is bound to think not only of himself, but of his fellow-workmen.

Sevens, Social Reform, p. 115.

2. Attachment or loyalty to the principle of union, or to some particular union; specifically, attachment or loyalty to the federal union known as the United States of America, and opposition to its rupture, as by the secession of the Southern States in 1861-5.

Mr. Seward had an abiding faith in the Unionism and latent loyalty of Virginia and the border States.

The Century, XXXV. 609.

3. In British politics, the principles or sentiments of the Unionists.

unionist (ū'nyon-ist), n. and a. [< union + -ist]. I. n. 1. One who promotes or advocates union.—2. A member of a trade-union; a trade-unionist. Sevens, Social Reform, p. 109.—3. One who during the American civil war took the side of the national government.

At the same station, we met General Shriver of Frederick, a most loyal Unionist.

O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 25.

4. [cap.] In British politics, one who is opposed to the dissolution or rupture of the legislative union existing between Great Britain and Ireland, and especially to the separatist principles and tendencies of those who desire to establish home rule in Ireland: a name applied to the Conservatives and Liberal-Unionists.

II. a. 1. Of or pertaining to a union or to unionism; promoting or advocating union: as, a unionist movement; a unionist party.

Their [the workmen's] low standard of work, determined by the unionist principle that the better workers must not discredit the worse by exceeding them in efficiency.

H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, p. 211.

2. Specifically, during the civil war in the United States, of or pertaining to the Union party or cause.

unionistic (ū'nyo-nis'tik), a. [< unionist + -ic]. Pertaining to unionism or unionists; relating to or promoting union.

The various phases of a unionistic movement.
P. Schaff, Hist. Christ. Ch., I. § 22.

unionite (ū'ni-ō-nit), n. [< NL. Unionites, < Unio (n), q. v.] A fossil union, or some similar shell.

union-joint (ū'nyon-joint), n. A pipe-coupling; a union. E. H. Knight.

unionoid (ū'ni-ō-nid), a. and n. [< Unio (n) + -oid]. I. a. Same as unioniform.

II. n. Same as unionid.

union-pump (ū'nyon-pump), n. A pump combined in the same frame with an engine. E. H. Knight.

union-room (ū'nyon-rōm), n. The room in a brewery in which the unions for partly fermented beer stand together, and from which the beer is racked off.

The union-room [Allsop's] contains 1,424 unions, which can cleanse 230,000 gallons at one time. Bickerdike.

uniovulate (ū-ni-ō'vū-lāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + NL. ovulum, ovule: see ovule]. Having but one ovule.

unipara (ū-nip'ā-rā), n. A woman who has borne one child.

uniparous (ū-nip'ā-rus), a. [< L. unus, one, + parere, bring forth, bear, + -ous]. 1. Producing one at a birth: as, uniparous animals.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.—2. In bot., having but one axis or branch: as, a uniparous cyme.

unipartite (ū-ni-pār'tit), a. [< L. unus, one, + partitus, parted: see partite]. Not separated into parts.

In the theory of the single system the conceptions and symbolism are to a large extent arithmetical, and are based upon the properties of single integral numbers and their partitions into single integral parts. In this sense the former theory may be regarded as being unipartite.
Nature, XLI. 390.

Unipartite curve, a curve whose real part forms one continuous whole (it being understood that a passage through infinity does not constitute a severing of the curve).

uniped (ū-ni-ped), a. and n. [< L. unus, one, + pes (ped-), foot.] I. a. Having only one foot.

II. n. One who or that which is one-footed. Compare monopode. [Rare.]

One of the best gymnasts in Chicago is a person with a wooden leg, which he takes off at the beginning of operations, thus economizing weight and stowage, and performing feats impossible except to unipeds.

W. Mathews, Getting on in the World, p. 194.

Unipeltata (ū-ni-pel-tā-tā), n. pl. [NL. (Latreille), neut. pl. of unipeltatus: see unipeltate.] In Crustacea, a division of stomatopods, containing adult forms of mantis-shrimps: distinguished from Bipeltata. See Squilla.

unipeltate (ū-ni-pel-tāt), a. and n. [< L. unus, one, + pelta, a light shield: see peltate.] I. a. Having a carapace of one piece, as a crustacean; not bipeltate, like a glass-crab; stomatopodous, as a mantis-shrimp.

II. n. A member of the Unipeltata. See Squillidae.

unipersonal (ū-ni-pēr-son-āl), a. [< L. unus, one, + persona, person: see personal.] 1. Having but one person; existing in one person: said of the Deity.—2. In gram., used only in one person: chiefly noting verbs used only in the third person singular; impersonal.

unipersonalist (ū-ni-pēr-son-āl-ist), n. [< unipersonal + -ist.] One who believes there is but one person in the Deity.

unipersonality (ū-ni-pēr-son-āl-i-ti), n. [< unipersonal + -ity.] Existence in one person only.

unipetalous (ū-ni-pet-ā-lus), a. [< L. unus, one, + NL. petalum, petal: see petal.] Having but one petal.

Such a corolla [consisting of one petal on account of abortion of the others] is unipetalous, a term quite distinct from monopetalous. Encyc. Brit., IV. 132.

uniphonous (ū-ni-fō-nus), a. [< L. unus, one, + Gr. φωνή, a sound.] Having or giving out only one sound; monophonic. [Rare.]

That uniphonous instrument the drum.

Westminster Rev., Nov., 1832. (Encyc. Dict.)

uniplanar (ū-ni-plā-nār), a. [< L. unus, one, + planum, plane.] Lying in one plane.

The first three chapters of the work deal with the usual problems of hydrodynamics, being occupied principally with those in which the motion is uniplanar or can be expressed by two co-ordinates.

The Academy, April 11, 1891, p. 349.

Uniplanar dyadic. See dyadic.—Uniplanar node, a degenerate form of a node or conical point on a surface, where the cone degenerates into two coincident planes: same as unode.

uniplicate (ū-nip-li-kāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + plicatus, pp. of plicare, fold: see plicate.] Once folded; having or forming a single fold. Compare duplicate, triplicate, quadruplicate.

unipolar (ū-ni-pō-lār), a. [< L. unus, one, + polus, pole: see polar.] 1. Exhibiting one kind of polarity.

The so-called "unipolar" induction supposed to be due to the rotation of the earth, which behaves like a gigantic magnet. P. G. Tail, Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 330.

2. In biol., having a single pole, as a nerve-cell or a rete: correlated with bipolar, multipolar.

If the rete remains broken up, then it is known as a diffuse, unipolar, or monocentric rete mirabile.

Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 597.

Unipolar conduction. Same as irreciprocal conduction (which see, under irreciprocal).—Unipolar dynamo, a dynamo in which an electromotive force is induced in a conductor by causing it to revolve round one pole of a magnet.

unipolarity (ū-ni-pō-lar-i-ti), n. [< unipolar + -ity.] The character of being unipolar.

We do not believe that Ohm ever observed the phenomenon of unipolarity in strong sulphuric acid with electrodes of platinum or gold due to a transition resistance. Philos. Mag., XXVI. 129.

uniporous (ū-nip-ō-rus), a. [< L. unus, one, + porus, pore.] Having one pore.

Wood-cells elsewhere called piserous tissue, and to which I applied the terms uniporous and multiporous. Darwin, Geol. Hist. of Plants, p. 160.

unique (ū-nēk'), a. and n. [< F. unique = Sp. Pg. It. unico, < L. unus, one, only, single, < unus, one.] I. a. 1. Only; single.

Do I mention these seeming inconsistencies to smile at or upbraid my unique cousin? Lamb, My Relations.

2. Having no like or equal; unmatched; sole; unequalled; single in its kind or excellence: often used relatively, and then signifying rare, unusual.

That which gives to the Jews their unique position among the nations is what we are accustomed to regard as their Sacred History. Spectator, No. 3035, p. 1159.

II. n. A unique thing; a thing unparalleled or sole of its kind.

Sir Charles Mordant's gold medal, mean as it is in workmanship, is extremely curious, and may be termed an Unic, being the only one of the kind that has come to our knowledge. Archæologia (1774), III. 374.

Where is the master who could have instructed Franklin, or Washington, or Bacon, or Newton? Every great man is a unique. Emerson, Self-reliance.

uniquely (ū-nēk'li), adv. In a unique manner; so as to be unique.

uniqueness (ū-nēk'nes), n. The state or character of being unique.

uniquity (ū-nēk'wi-ti), n. [Irreg. < unique + -ity.] Uniqueness. [Rare.]

Uniquity will make them valued more.

H. Walpole, Letters, iv. 477 (1789). (Davies.)

uniradiate (ū-ni-rā-di-āt), a. [< L. unus, one, + radius, ray: see radiate.] Having only one ray, arm, or process; monactinal.

uniradiated (ū-ni-rā-di-āt-ed), a. Same as uniradiate.

uniramose (ū-ni-rā-mōs), a. Same as uniramous. Micros. Sci., XXX. 109.

uniramous (ū-ni-rā-mus), a. [< L. unus, one, + ramus, branch: see ramus.] Having but one ramus or branch. See biramous. Encyc. Brit., VI. 652.

unisepalous (ū-ni-sep-ā-lus), a. [< L. unus, one, + NL. sepalum, sepal: see sepal.] Having but one sepal.

uniseptate (ū-ni-sep-tāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + septum, partition: see septe.] In zool. and bot., having only one septum or partition.

uniserial (ū-ni-sē-ri-āl), a. [< L. unus, one, + series, series: see serial.] 1. Set in one row or series; one-ranked; unifarious. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 190.—2. Beset with one rank, row, or series of things.

uniseriably (ū-ni-sē-ri-āl-i), adv. So as to be uniserial; in one series.

uniseriate (ū-ni-sē-ri-āt), a. [< L. unus, one, + series, series: see seriate.] Same as uniseriably.

uniseriately (ū-ni-sē-ri-āt-li), adv. Same as uniseriably.

uniserrate (ū-ni-ser-āt), a. [< L. unus, one, + serra, saw: see serrate.] Having one row of teeth or serrations; uniserially serrate.

unisexual (ū-ni-sek'sū-āl), a. [< L. unus, one, + sexus, sex: see sexual.] 1. Of one sex—that is, having the two sexes developed in different individuals. [Rare].—2. For or consisting of a single sex. [Rare.]

One final provincialism of the mind there is, which a unisexual college certainly never would have any power to eradicate. . . . It is the provincialism of the exclusively sex point of view itself. The Century, XXXII. 326.

3. Specifically, in entom., having only female individuals: noting the agamic broods of Aphididae and some other insects which, during certain parts of the year, continue to propagate the species without any males. See parthenogenesis.—4. In bot., said of a flower containing the organs of but one sex, stamens or pistil, but not both; diclinous: opposed to bisexual or hermaphrodite; monœcious or diœcious. It is also applicable to an inflorescence or a plant with such flowers only.

unisexuality (ū-ni-sek'sū-āl-i-ti), n. [< unisexual + -ity.] The state or character of being unisexual, or of having but one sex, as a male or female individual: the opposite of hermaphroditism.

There is some reason to suspect that hermaphroditism was the primitive condition of the sexual apparatus, and that unisexuality is the result of the abortion of the organs of the other sex in males and females respectively. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 67.

unisexually (ū-ni-sek'sū-āl-i), adv. So as to be of either sex, but not of both sexes, in one individual: as, animals unisexually developed.

unisilicate (ū-ni-sil'i-kāt), n. [< L. unus, one, + E. silicate.] A salt of orthosilicic acid (H₄SiO₄): so called because the ratio of oxygen atoms combined with the base to those combined with the silicon is 1:1. This is illustrated by zinc unisilicate, willemite, which has the formula Zn₂SiO₄ or 2ZnO.SiO₂.

unisolated (un-is'ō-lā-ted), a. Not isolated or separated; undistinguished or undistinguishable.

The unisolated hyoid muscles of the frog.

Jour. Roy. Micros. Soc., 2d ser., VI. 47.

unison (ū-ni-son or -zōn), a. and n. [I. a. A. unisonous, q. v.; = Sp. unisono = Pg. unisno, < ML. unisonus, having one sound, < L. unus, one, + sonus, sound: see sound.] II. n. Early ma. E. unisonne, < F. unisson = Sp. unison = It. unisono, unison, concord of sounds: from the adj. I. a. 1. Sounding alone; unisonous.

All sounds on fret by string or golden wire, Temper'd soft tunings, intermix'd with voice, Choral or unison. Milton, P. L., vii. t.

2. In music, sounded simultaneously; specially, noting two or more voice-parts that coincide in pitch, or a passage or effect thus produced.—Unison string, in musical instruments strings, a string tuned in unison with another string, intended to be sounded with it. In the pianoforte the tones are produced from pairs or triplets of strings thus tuned. Such strings are commonly called unisons.

II. n. 1. In music: (a) The interval, melodic or harmonic, between any tone and a tone of exactly the same pitch; a perfect prime, acoustically represented by the ratio 1:1. The term is also used as a synonym of prime (as, an augmented unison), though this is objectionable. (b) The interval of the octave, especially when occurring between male and female voices, between higher and lower instruments of the same class.—2. The state of sounding at the same pitch—that is, of being at the interval of a unison.

"But he wants a shoe, poor creature!" said Obadiah. "Poor creature!" said my uncle Toby, vibrating the word back again, like a string in unison.

Sterne, Tristram Shandy, V.

3. A single unvaried tone; a monotone. Poet.—4. Same as unison string.—5. Accordance; agreement; harmony; concord.

He chants his prophetic song in exact unison with the designs. Burke, Rev. in France, x.

I had the good fortune to act in perfect unison with my colleague. D. Webster, Speech, Boston, June 5, 18 unisonal (ū-ni-sō-nāl), a. [< unison + -al.] Being in unison; unisonant.

We missed . . . the magnificent body of tone in the broad unisonal passages in the finale.

Athenæum, No. 3082, p. 6

unisonally (ū-ni-sō-nāl-i), adv. In a unison manner; in unison.

Tenors and basses burst in unisonally.

Church Times, March 4, 1887. (Encyc. Dic.) unisonance (ū-ni-sō-nans), n. [= Sp. Pg. unisonancia; as unisonant + -ce.] Accordance of sounds; unison.

unisonant (ū-ni-sō-nant), a. [= OF. unisonnant, < L. unus, one, + sonant(-t)s, ppr. of sonare, sound; cf. unison.] Being in unison; having the same degree of gravity or acuteness.

Whether the order of those sounds was ascending, descending, or unisonant.

Lambillotte, tr. in N. and Q., 7th ser., VII. 16

unisonous (ū-ni-sō-nus), a. [< ML. unisonus, having one sound: see unison.] 1. Being in unison: said of two or more sounds having the same pitch; unisonant. Grove, Dict. Music, I. 763.—2. Sounding alone; without harmony.

These apt notes were about forty tunes, of one part only, and in one unisonous key.

T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, III.

unispiral (ū-ni-spī-rāl), a. In bot., having a single spiral, as the elaters of certain liverworts.

unisulcate (ū-ni-sul-kāt), a. In bot. and zool., having a single groove or furrow; one-grooved.

unit (ū-nit), n. [Formerly unite, a later form of unity: see unity.] 1. A single thing or person opposed to a plurality; also, any group regarded as individual in a plurality of similar groups; any one of the individuals or similar groups into which a complex whole may be analyzed.

When first, amid the general discredit of the experiment tried by Lord Cornwallis in Bengal proper, the Indian administrators of fifty or sixty years since began to recognize the village community as the true proprietary unit of the country, they had very soon to face the problem of rent. Maine, Village Communities, p. 18.

The family is the integral and formative unit of civilization. E. Muirford, The Nation, x.

The elementary tissues, particularly tracheary, sieve fibrous, and parenchymatous tissues, are to be considered as the units, and the term Fibro-vascular Bundle as little more than a convenient expression of the usual condition of aggregation of these units. Essey, Botany, p. 10.

These columns are not fighting units at all, but supplies of like may be classed with commissariat trains at services of like nature. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XII. 80.

2. Any standard quantity by the repetition or subdivision of which any other quantity of the same kind is measured. The unit of abstract arithmetic, called unity, is represented by the numeral 1. The system of units recommended by a committee of the British Association for scientific calculations, and known as the C. G. S. system (abbreviation of centimeter-gram and system), adopts the centimeter as the unit of length, gram as the unit of mass, and the second as the unit of time. In this system the unit of area is the square centimeter, the unit of volume is the cubic centimeter, and the unit of velocity is a velocity of a centimeter per second. The unit of momentum is the momentum of a gram moving with a velocity of a centimeter per second. The unit of force is that force which acting on a gram for one second generates a velocity of a centimeter per second. This force is called a dyne. The unit of work is the work done by the force of a dyne working through a distance of a centimeter. This is called an erg. Sometimes used attributively.

The ordinary smallest measure we have of either [extension or duration] is looked on as a unit in number, when the mind by division would reduce them into less actions. Locke, Human Understanding, II, xv. 9.

For purposes of accuracy it must always be remembered at the pound, the gramme, &c., are, strictly speaking, units of mass. J. D. Everett, Units and Physics, Const., p. 23.

The unit of magnetic moment is the moment of a magnet of unit length the strength of whose poles is equal to unity, or generally of any magnet the product of whose length into its length is equal to unity.

J. E. H. Gordon, Elect. and Mag., I, 154.

absolute unit, a unit of an absolute system of measurement based entirely on arbitrary units of mass, length, and time; sometimes, but quite incorrectly, used as the synonym of a unit of the C. G. S. system, which is only a special system of absolute units. Abstract unit, the unit of measurement; the number represented by 1.—Alternate units. Same as Hankel's numbers (which see, under number).—B. A. unit of resistance. See ohm.—Concrete or denominate unit, a unit of some definite kind, a yard, a second, a dollar, a Fahrenheit degree, etc.—Decimal units, duodecimal units, units in scales of numbers increasing or decreasing by ten or twelve.

Electrical units. See electrostatic.—Electromagnetic units. See electromagnetic.—Electrostatic units of electricity. See electrostatic.—Fundamental units. See fundamental.—Magnetic unit, a unit of electrical or magnetic quantity, founded on the forces which act on conductors conveying currents, or on magnets, in a magnetic field. See electromagnetic units, under electromagnetic.—Monetary unit. See monetary.—Neural units. See neural.—Siemens's unit [named after the electrician Siemens], a unit formerly employed in measuring the electrical resistance of a conductor: it is the resistance of a column of pure mercury 1 square millimeter in section and meter long; it is a little less than an ohm.—Thermal unit, a unit adopted for measuring and comparing quantities of heat. In the English system of measures the generally accepted thermal unit is the pound-degree, or the amount of heat required to raise a pound of water from the temperature 50° F. to 51° F. (Taft). In the metric system the unit of heat is the calory—that is, the amount necessary to raise a kilogram of water from 0° to 1° centigrade; the small calory, the heat needed to raise the temperature of a gram of water the same amount.—Unit angle, a circular measure, same as radian.—Unit field. See unit.

Unit jar, jar, an instrument of various forms devised for measuring definite quantities of electricity.—Unit magnetic pole, a pole which repels a like pole with unit resistance with unit force.—Unit of resistance, a unit of resistance of a conductor, the farad.—Unit of capacity, the resistance of a conductor through which a current of unit strength is maintained by unit electrostatic force.—Unit of electric potential, the difference of potential between the ends of a straight conductor, of unit length, when it is moved with unit velocity in a direction at right angles to lines of force and its own length is a magnetic field of unit intensity.—Unit of force, the dyne or the poundal. See def. 2.—Unit of heat. See thermal unit.—Unit of illumination. See candle-power.

Unit of length, a length in multiples of which other lengths are defined.—Unit of mass, a certain conventional dimension or magnitude assumed as a standard by which other dimensions or magnitudes of the same kind are to be measured, as a foot, a gallon, an ounce, a pound, an hour, and the like. See measure, weight.—Unit of measurement, a quantity used as the consequent of a ratio for defining other quantities.—Unit of output, a unit by which the rate of working or the activity in an electric circuit is measured. The British Board of Trade unit of output is 1,000 watts.—Unit of photometry. See photometric standard, under photometric.—Unit of resistance. See resistance, 3, and ohm.—Unit of self-induction, in elect., in any system of units, the same as the unit of length employed in the basis of the system. For the practical unit of induction in the centimeter-gram-second system, an earth quadrant, or a length equal to 109 centimeters, has been proposed. This unit has been called henry, which has been replaced by henry.—Unit of tale, a number of things, generally of a particular kind, recognized as a unit, as a dozen, a score, a sum of nails, a lac of rupees, etc.—Unit pole. See pole.—Unit prism, in crystal. See prism, 3.—Unit pyramid, in crystal. See pyramid, 3.—Unit rule, in U. S. politics, a rule sometimes adopted providing that a national nominating convention should have the votes of the entire delegation from each State shall be cast in a body for the candidate preferred by the majority of the delegation, the wishes of the minority being disregarded.

unitable (ū-ni'ta-bl), a. [< unite + -able.] Capable of being united; capable of union by growth or otherwise. Also spelled unitable. unital (ū-ni'tal), a. [< unit + -al.] Of or pertaining to a unit; unitary. [Rare.]

In nature there is a great, unitary, continuous . . . development. Littell's Living Age, No. 2071, March 1, 1884, p. 515.

unitarian (ū-ni-tā'-ri-an), a. and n. [As unitary + -ian.] 1. a. Of or relating to a unit or unity; or to one thing or plan or party; unitary. 2. n. One who holds the doctrine of the unity of God, or who holds the doctrine of the unity of the universe. It is a division of powers) forms the essential distinction between a federal system such as that of America or Switzerland, and a unitarian system of government such as that which exists in England or Russia.

A. V. Dicey, Law of the Constitution, p. 142.

These two theories, the one dualistic, the other unitarian, strangely foreshadow the discoveries of modern dynamics. Encyc. Brit., I, 460.

2. [cap.] Of or pertaining to the Unitarians or their doctrines.—Unitarian Church. See II, 1.

II. n. 1. [cap.] One who maintains the unipersonality of the Deity; one who denies the doctrine of the Trinity; specifically, a member of a Christian body founded upon the doctrine of unipersonality. The churches of the Unitarian body are congregational in government, and independent of one another. They possess no common symbol of doctrine, and differ widely among themselves. They may be divided into two schools of thought, though there is no sharply defined line between them. The conservative Unitarians hold doctrinal views in many respects resembling those of the orthodox Trinitarians, except in their denial of the tripersonality of the Deity. They accept Christ as the manifestation of God in a human life, though they do not regard him as equal in character or power with the Father. They believe in the work of the Holy Spirit, though they do not generally regard him as a distinct personality. They believe in the Scriptures as containing a divine revelation, and in the miracles as an attestation of that revelation. They hold a doctrine of inherited depravity, but not in guilt, except as the result of a personal choice; to a doctrine of future retribution, though not generally to its endlessness; to an atonement by Christ for the sins of mankind, but not to the expiatory theory of that atonement (see atonement); and to the necessity of regeneration wrought by the Spirit of God, but only with the cooperation of man; in what is called "irresistible grace" they do not believe. The doctrines of election, reprobation, foreordination, and decrees, as those doctrines are interpreted in the Calvinistic symbols, they repudiate as unscriptural and irrational. The radical school of Unitarians hold views not materially varying from deism. They reverence Christ as a peculiarly holy man, with whom the Spirit of God abode, but in no sense other than that in which he abides with every truly holy man. They respect the Bible as a work of transcendent moral genius, but in no other sense inspired. They do not believe in the miracles, and either explain them as the product of natural causes or regard the accounts of them as mythical and traditional. They do not accept the doctrines of atonement and regeneration, and do not employ the terms; and they both attribute sin to defective education, intellectual and moral, and depend upon a right education to redeem the world from its effects. The Unitarian movement in the United States was developed chiefly in New England about the beginning of the nineteenth century, under the lead of Dr. Channing. Many of the oldest Congregational churches in New England passed under Unitarian control, and the "American Unitarian Association" was formed in 1825. Outside of the denomination proper, Unitarian views are held by the Hickeys, Friends, some Universalists, and by individuals in other denominations. See Arian, Socinianism.

2. A monotheist; a believer in one God, as opposed to a polytheist, or a believer in many gods. In this sense it is applicable to all Christians, Jews, and Mohammedans, as well as deists. Fleming. [Rare.]

3. A monist.

The Realists or Substantialists are again divided into Dualists, and into Unitarians or Monists, according as they are or are not contented with the testimony of consciousness to the ultimate duplicity of subject and object in perception. Sir W. Hamilton, Metaphysics, xvi.

4. One who advocates any unitary system; an advocate of unity; in politics, an advocate of centralization.

The old men studied magic in the flowers,
And human fortunes in astronomy,
And all omnipotence in chemistry.
Preferring things to names, for these were men,
Were unitarians of the united world,
And, wheresoever their clear eye-beams fell,
They caught the footsteps of the Same.

Emerson, Blight.

Unitarianism (ū-ni-tā'-ri-an-izm), n. [< Unitarian + -ism.] 1. The affirmation of the unipersonality of the Deity; the denial of the doctrine of the Trinity, or (rarely) of polytheism; the doctrines of the Unitarians.—2. [l. c.] Any unitary system.

The principle, in short, which gives its form to our governmentalists (to use a foreign but convenient expression) unitarianism, or the habitual exercise of supreme legislative authority by one central power.

A. V. Dicey, Law of the Constitution, p. 127.

3. [l. c.] In philos., the doctrine that mind and matter are one, or that there is but one general kind of substance.

Unitarianize (ū-ni-tā'-ri-an-iz), v.; pret. and pp. unitarianized, pr. unitarianizing. [< Unitarian + -ize.] To cause to conform, or to conform to Unitarianism. Imp. Dict.

unitary (ū-ni-tā'-ri), a. [= F. unitaire = Sp. It. unitario, unitarian (chiefly as a noun, a Unitarian); as unit, unit-y, + -ary.] 1. Of or relating to a unit; of the nature of a unit; not divided; entire; specifically noting in chemistry that system in which the molecules of all bodies are compared, as to their magnitude, with one molecule—water, for example—and all chemical reactions are as far as possible reduced to one typical form of reaction, namely double decomposition. Watts, Dict. of Chem.—2. Of or pertaining to, or characterized by, unity or uniformity; also, directed at or striving for unity;

as, a unitary system of thought; in politics, centralized.

Man loves the Universal, the Unchangeable, the Unitary. Channing, Perfect Life, p. 110.

Had any one doubted before that the rights of human nature are unitary, . . . the efforts of the advocates of slavery . . . could not fail to sharpen his eyes.

Lovell, Study Windows, p. 178.

We know that the separation and isolation of the different parts of a once unitary community must necessarily bring about a separation of its language into different dialects. W. D. Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., ix.

It of course by no means follows that, because we have become in the fullest organic sense a nation, ours has become a unitary government, its federal features merged in a new national organization. W. Wilson, State, § 881.

3. In biol., monistic, as distinguished from dualistic.

The tendency called unitary or monistic . . . must ultimately prevail throughout philosophy.

Haeckel, Evolution of Man (trans.), I, 17.

4. Pertaining to or of the nature of a unit (of measurement).

A wind pressure of 1,200 pounds for the same unitary distance is allowed for. Sci. Amer., N. S., LX, 304.

5. In math., involving a root to unit power.

Unitas Fratrum (ū-ni-tas frā'trum). [NL., unity of brethren: L. unitas, unity; fratrum, gen. pl. of frater, brother: see brother.] The proper official name of the Moravian Church. See Moravian, n., 2.

unitate (ū-ni-tāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. unitated, pr. unitating. [< back-formation from unitation.] To perform the operation of unitation upon.

unitate (ū-ni-tāt), n. [As unit + -ate.] The remainder given by a number after division by a digit.

unitation (ū-ni-tā'shon), n. [< unit + -ation.]

1. Expression in terms of units; measurement in accordance with a system of units.—2. The operation of adding to the units of a number, written in the Arabic notation, (10—N) times the tens (where N is any number less than 10), (10—N)2 times the hundreds, etc., and repeating the process until a digit is obtained. This (diminished by any multiple of N which it exceeds) is the remainder after dividing the original number by N.

unite (ū-nit'), v.; pret. and pp. united, pr. uniting. [< LL. unitus, pp. of unire (> It. unire = Sp. Pg. unir = F. unir), make one or as one, join together, < L. unus, one: see one, a. Cf. one, v., and adumation.] 1. trans. 1. To combine or conjoin so as to form one; make to be one and to be no longer separate; incorporate in one: as, to unite two kingdoms or two armies.

Unite

Your troops of horsemen with his hands of foot.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., IV, l. 164.

As thou hast united our nature to thy eternal being, thou mightest also unite my person to thine by the interior adunations of love, and obedience, and conformity.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I, 37.

2. To connect, conjoin, bring together, or associate by some bond, legal or other; join in interest, affection, fellowship, or the like; ally; link together; associate; conjoin; couple; combine: as, to unite families by marriage; to unite nations by treaty; to unite fresh adherents to a cause.

Hymen did our hands

Unite commutual in most sacred bands.

Shak., Hamlet, III, 2, 170.

3. To make to agree or be uniform; harmonize.

The king proposed nothing more than to unite his kingdom in one form of worship. Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

4. To cause to adhere; attach; connect together: as, to unite bricks or stones by means of cement.

The peritoneum, which is a dry body, may be united with the muscular flesh.

Wiesman, Surgery.

= Syn. 1. To consolidate, amalgamate, blend, merge.

II. intrans. 1. To become one; become combined or incorporated; be consolidated; coalesce; combine; commingle.

Virgin Mother, hail,

High in the love of Heaven; yet from my loins

Thou shalt proceed, and from thy womb the Son

Of God Most High; so God with man unites.

Milton, P. L., XII, 382.

2. To join in action; concur; act in concert.

If you will now unite in your complaints,

And force them with a constancy, the cardinal

Cannot stand under them.

Shak., Hen. VIII., III, 2, 1.

unite¹ (ū-nit'), a. [< LL. unitus, pp. of unire, unite = *unite*¹, v.] United; joint. Webster.

unite¹ (ū-nit'), n. [*< unite*¹, v., with ref. to the union of the kingdoms of England and Scotland alluded to on the coin in the motto "Faciunt eos in gentem unam," "I will make them one nation" (Ezek. xxxvii. 22). An English gold coin issued by James I. and current for 20 shillings; a Jacobus. A gold coin of the same name and value was issued under Charles I., when it was also called carolus (which see), and under the Commonwealth and Charles II.

unite², n. An obsolete spelling of unit.

united (ū-nī'ted), p. a. [< unite¹ + -ed²]. 1. Joined or combined; made one; made to agree; allied; harmonious: as, a united household.

Th' united strength of all the gods above

In vain resists th' omnipotence of Jove.

Pope, Iliad, i. 734.

[England] found it difficult to maintain a contest against the united navies of France and Spain.

Macaulay, Lord Clive.

2. In Rom. Cath. usage, noting those communities which have separated from Oriental churches and united with the Roman Catholic Church in what it holds to be essential, but preserve an individual and distinctive church organization, acknowledging the supremacy of the Pope, and accepting the doctrinal decisions of the Roman Catholic Church, while retaining to some extent their ancient liturgy, rites, discipline, and usages.—United Armenians. See Armenian Church, under Armenian.—United Brethren. See Christian and Moravian.—United Brethren in Christ, a brotherly denomination, Arminian in doctrine, and essentially, although not universally, Methodist in polity. It was founded in Pennsylvania in 1800 by Philip William Otterbein. The government of the church is vested primarily in a general conference. The chief officers of the church are bishops elected every four years, presiding elders, and pastors appointed to their charges according to a system of itinerancy. The denomination makes the mode of baptism and the practice of feet-washing optional with each of its members.—United Colonies of New England. See New England Confederation, under confederation.—United Greeks, the members of those churches which retain, with some important modifications, the Greek liturgy and discipline, and other ancient Greek usages—as marriage of the lower clergy, communion under both kinds, and the use of leavened bread in the communion service—but are in union with the Roman Catholic Church. They are found chiefly in Austria-Hungary, Russia, Italy, and Turkey. See Unitat.—United Irishmen, an Irish society formed in 1791 by T. W. Tone, for the purpose of procuring parliamentary reform and the repeal of the penal laws. It afterward became a secret society with revolutionary aims, and was influential in causing the Irish rebellion of 1798.—United Kingdom. See kingdom.—United Original Seceders. See seceder.—United Presbyterian Church. See Presbyterian.—United Provinces, the seven provinces of the Low Countries, Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Friesland, Gelderland, Groningen, and Overijssel, which in 1579 formed the Union of Utrecht and laid the foundation of the republic of the Netherlands.—United States, used attributively, of or pertaining to the United States of America; American: as, the United States army; the United States navy; the United States statutes; colloquially, the United States language. The adjective United States is used where American may appear less exact.

unitedly (ū-nī'ted-li), adv. In a united manner; with united or joint efforts; jointly; amicably.

unitedentacular (ū-nī'ten-tak'ū-lār), a. Having but one tentacle. Amer. Nat., XXXII. 597.

uniter (ū-nī'tēr), n. [< unite¹ + -er¹]. One who or that which unites or forms a connection.

The Priest presides over the worship of the people; is the Uniter of them with the Unseen Holy. Carlyle.

uniterable (un-it'ēr-ā-bl), a. That cannot be renewed or repeated.

To play away an uniterable life. Sir T. Browne, Christian Morals, iii. § 23.

uniting (ū-nish'ŭn), n. [< ML. unitio(n), a uniting, < LL. unire, unite; see unite¹]. The act of uniting, or the state of being united; junction; union. [Rare.]

As long as any different substance keeps off the uniting, hope not to cure the wound. Wiseman, Surgery, v. 1.

The precise and total meaning of Christianity . . . is that it affirms the perfect union of the Divine and human natures in Christ. H. James, Subs. and Shad., p. 242.

unitism (ū-ni-tizm), n. [< unit + -ism]. Same as monism, 1.

unitive (ū-ni-tiv), a. [< unite¹ + -ive]. Having the power of uniting; causing or tending to unite; producing or promoting union; harmonizing.

There is a degree of meditation so exalted that it changes the very name, and is called contemplation; and it is in the unitive way of religion—that is, it consists in unions and adherences to God. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), i. 71.

A unitive power. J. H. Neuman, Development of Christ, Doct., i. 33.

unitively (ū-ni-tiv-li), adv. In a unitive or united manner. Cudworth. [Rare.]

unitize (ū-ni-tiz), v. t.; pret. and pp. unitized, ppr. unitizing. [< unit + -ize]. To form into or reduce to a unit; make a unit of; cause to be one. Imp. Dict.

unity (ū-nī-ti), n.; pl. unities (-tiz). [Formerly also unitie (also reduced unite, unit: see unit); < OF. (and F.) unité = Sp. unidad = Pg. unidade = It. unità, < L. unita(t)-s, oneness, singleness, sameness, uniformity, agreement, < unus, one: see one.] 1. The state or property of being one; oneness, as opposed to multiplicity; individuality, as opposed to plurality.

Now unity, which is defined, is in its own nature more apt to be understood than multiplicity, which in some measure participates of infinity. Dryden, Life of Plutarch.

It sufficing to the unity of any idea that it be considered as one representation or picture, though made up of ever so many particulars.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxiv. 1.

2. Organic totality; that interconnection of parts which constitutes a complex whole; a systematic whole as distinguished from its constituent parts: as, the unity of consciousness; the unity of an artistic creation. See def. 9.

The simplest human consciousness contains more than sensation, it contains a reference of sensation to objects; the simplest human consciousness also contains some conception of the unity of all objects in one world (were it but that it represents them all as existing in one space and one time). Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 203.

An empirical acquaintance with facts rises to a scientific knowledge of facts, as soon as the mind discovers beneath the multiplicity of single production the unity of an organic system. Maz Müller.

3. Identity; self-sameness; uniformity.

If the unity of the Ego is really illusory, if the permanent identical "I" is not a fact but a fiction, as Hume and his followers maintain, why should one part of the series of feelings into which the Ego is resolved be concerned with another part of the same series, any more than with any other series? H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 389.

We are able to say that the Unity or Continuity of nature is a principle or law of experience. W. R. Sorley, Ethics of Naturalism, p. 267.

4. The state of being united or combined in one; especially, union as connected parts of a complex whole: as, the national unity of the separate states.

England had hardly as yet [899] realized the need of national unity, and outside the king's council chamber there can have been few who understood the need of union between the nations of Christendom. J. R. Green, Cong. of Eng., ii.

5. Harmony or accord in sentiments, affection, action, etc.; concord.

How good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! Ps. cxxxiii. 1.

Unity, secrecy, decision, are the qualities which military arrangements require. Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

6. Sameness of character or effect; agreement; coincidence.

There is such unity in the proofs. Shak., W. T., v. 2. 35.

7. In math., a quantity which, multiplied by any quantity of the system considered, gives that same quantity as the product. Thus, in the theory of matrices, the matrix of any order having all the constituents zero except those of the principal diagonal, which are all ones, is the unity of that order. In ordinary algebra one, or the unit of abstract number, is the only unity. Unit and unity are words frequently confused; but with accurate writers unit is the standard of measurement, that which is counted, and has no reference to multiplication; while unity has reference to multiplication alone. In a multiple associative algebra there are as many units as the ordinal number of the algebra, but there can be but one unity, and there need not be any at all.

8. The principle by which a uniform tenor of story and propriety of representation is preserved in literary compositions; conformity in a composition to this principle; a reference to some one purpose or leading idea, or to the main proposition, in all the parts of a discourse or composition. The so-called Aristotelian law of unity of time, of place, and of action (called 'the unities') in a drama was the fundamental rule or general idea from which the French classical dramatic writers and critics derived, or to which they referred, all their practical rules for the construction of a drama. This law demanded that there should be no shifting of the scene from place to place, that the whole series of events should be such as might occur within the space of a single day, and that nothing should be admitted irrelevant to the development of the single plot.

The author has not observed a single unity in his whole play. Addison, Sir Timothy Tittle.

The writers of plays have what they call unity of time and place, to give a justness to their representation. Steele, Spectator, No. 358.

The so-called unities of time and place are purely fictitious principles; to either of which it is convenient to adhere in order to make the unity of an action more distinctly perceptible, and either of which may with equal propriety be disregarded in order to give action probability.

A. W. Ward, Intro. to Eng. Dram. Lit., p.

9. In artistic creations, a combination of parts such as to constitute a whole or to exhibit form of symmetry in style and character; the quality of any work by which all the parts subordinate to or promotive of one general sign or effect.

Among the susceptibilities touched by artistic arrangements may be noticed the sense of Unity in multi arising when a great number of things are brought under a comprehensive design, as when a row of pillar crowned by a pediment.

A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 255.

10. In law: (a) The holding of the same estate in undivided shares by two or more; tenancy. (b) The joint possession by one person of two rights by several titles.—11. gold coin of the reign of James I. See unit.—Architectonic unity. See architectonic.—At unit at one; in accord or harmony.

A character at unity with itself . . . is strong by very negations. George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, v.

Formal unity. See formal.—Manchester Unity. Odd-Fellow.—Material, mathematical, numerical unity. See the adjectives.—Primitive 7th root unity. See primitive.—Unity of apperception. apperception.—Unity of estate, of possession, of title. See estate in joint tenancy, under estate.—Unity of type, in blot. See type.—Syn. 1-4. junction, Connection, etc. See union.

univalence (ū-niv'a-lens), n. [< univalen(t)-ce]. In chem., the property of being univalent.

univalency (ū-niv'a-len-si), n. [As univalence (see -cy)]. Same as univalence. Also called monovalency.

univalent (ū-niv'a-lent), a. [< L. unus, or + valen(t)-s, ppr. of valere, be strong, have power; see valid]. Having a valence of one or capable of replacing a single hydrogen atom in combination.

univald (ū-niv'a-lid), a. Same as univalent.

univalentate (ū-ni-val vāt), a. [As univalence -ate¹]. Same as univalence.

univalve (ū-ni-valv), a. and n. [< L. unus, or + valva, valve; see valve]. I. a. 1. Having one valve only, as a mollusk; not bivalve multivalve; univalved or univalvular. See —2. Having the carapace single, or not hinged in the middle line: specifying the cladocera or daphniaceous crustaceans. [Now rare.]

3. In bot., consisting of one valve or piece.

II. n. In conch., a univalve mollusk or shell; a shell consisting of a single piece; formally, a member of one of three Linnean divisions of Testacea, as distinguished from valves and multivalves. The great group of gastropods are univalves. The single valve is sometimes very small, rudimentary, or hidden beneath the mantle; in most cases it is large and stout, nearly or completely enclosing the soft parts; and in such cases it usually assumes a twist or spiral coil, either in one plane, or, often, rising in a conical spiral endlessly varied in tails of size, shape, etc. Such coiled univalve shells, familiar objects, as those of the snail, whelk, periwink etc. Sometimes the coils are quite flat, as in the plan bis; or the spire is so slight, and the first whorl so large that the resulting figure is ear-like or saucer-shaped, as the ormer. Some univalves are simple caps or cones, as limpets. Some are tubular, as the tooth-shells; or tubular and variously contorted, as the worm-shells or vermicular. Some have an egg-shaped or fusiform figure. Multivalves have actually a second shell or valve, the opiculum or lid of the aperture; this, however, does not count against their being univalvular. Many forms of binary univalves have special names, as heliconda, conico, disco, ovoid, trochoid, turbinate, turreted. The direction of the coiling, whether right or left, is dextrorse or sinistorse; a coiling in the opposite from the usual direction is reversed. The first whorl of a spiral univalve is the body-whorl; its opening is the aperture; the lips of the aperture are the outer or labrum, and the inner or columella, the labium; the lips may be variously produced, winged or alar, cancellate, etc. (See colostomatopoda, raphinostomatopoda.) The spiral pillar around which the whorls are coiled is the columella; the whorls above it ly-whorl or aperture are collectively the spire, ending in the tip, point, or apex. The opposite end of the shell is the umbilicus, which often presents a depression, the umbilical; the circumference, a completely lipped aperture, the peristoma. The spiral line between the successive whorls or volutions is the suture. See words italicized with various cuts there, or there cited.

A Univalve Shell, in longitudinal section, showing spiral whorls and other formations.

valved (ū-ni-valvd), a. [As univalence + ed.] adj. univalence.

valvular (ū-ni-val'vū-lār), a. [As univalence + ul.] Same as univalence.

versal (ū-ni-vēr'sal), a. and n. [F. universal = Sp. Pg. universal = It. universale, < L. universalis, of or belonging to all or to the whole, < universus, all together, whole, entire, collective, general; see universe. Hence colloq. br. versal, versal.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to the universe in its entirety, or to the human race collectively.

Sole monarch of the universal earth.

Shak., R. and J., iii. 2. 94.

All partial evil, universal good.

Pope, Essay on Man, i. 292.

Pertaining to all things or to all mankind distributively. This is the original and most proper signification.

These men which have no written law of God to shew that is good or evil carry written in their hearts the universal law of mankind, the Law of Reason, whereby you judge, as by a rule which God hath given unto all men for that purpose. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, i. 16.

Nothing can be to us Catholic or universal in Religion at what the Scripture teaches.

Milton, Elkonoklastes, xlii.

Which had the universal sanction of their own and all ruder ages. Story, Speech, Salem, Sept. 18, 1828.

Belonging to or predicated of all the members of a class considered without exception: a. universal rule. This meaning arose in logic, where it is called the complex sense of universal, and has been common in Latin since the second century.

Hearing applause and universal shout.

Shak., M. of V., iv. 2. 144.

We saw that every argument which tells in favour of the universal suffrage of the males tells equally in favour of male suffrage. Macaulay, West. Rev. Def. of Mill.

In logic, capable of being predicated of many individuals or single cases; general. This, called the simple sense of universal, in which the word is precisely equivalent to general, is quite opposed to its etymology and perpetuates a confusion of thought due to Aristotle, whose καθολον it translates. (See II. 1. (b).) In logic, it is nearly as old, perhaps older, than universe.

Universal agent, in logic, an agent with unequalled power, in respect of his principal, in all things which the agent can delegate, as distinguished from a general agent, who has unrestricted power in respect to a particular kind of business or at a particular place.—Universal arithmetic, algebra.—Universal chuck, a form of chuck having a face-plate with dogs which can move radially and simultaneously, to hold objects of different sizes.

Universal church, in theology, the church of God throughout the world.—Universal cognition. See cognition.

Universal compass, a compass with extension legs adapted for striking circles of either large or small size.—Universal concept, a general concept.—Universal conversion. See conversion, 2.—Universal coupling, coupling so made that the parts united may meet at various angles, as a gimbal joint.—Universal deluge. See deluge, 1.—Universal dial. See dial.—Universal element. See element.—Universal Friends, an American sect of the eighteenth century, followers of Jemima Wilkinson, who professed to have prophetic and miraculous powers.—Universal galvanometer, a galvanometer capable of measuring either currents or electromotive forces or resistances. It usually consists of an ordinary galvanometer, which may have any suitable form, combined with a set of resistance-coils and a slide-bridge mounted on one base.—Universal gravitation. See gravitation.

Universal instrument, in astronomy, a species of altitude and azimuth instrument constructed so as to combine portability with great power. The telescope of the instrument, instead of being a straight tube, is usually broken into two arms at right angles to each other in the middle of its length, and at the break a totally reflecting prism turns the rays entering the object-glass along the eye-end of the telescope which forms part of the horizontal axis of the circle, so that the telescope becomes vertical in use through all altitudes.—Universal joint. See joint.—Universal legatee, in Scots law, a legatee to whom a testator gives his whole estate, subject only to the claims of other legacies and debts.—Universal lever, logic, method, partnership. See the nouns.—Universal mood, a mood of syllogism concluding a universal proposition.—Universal part, a part of a universal whole. See part.—Universal Postal Union. See postal union.—Universal proposition. See proposition.—Universal successor, in Scots law, an heir who succeeds to the whole of the inheritance of a person who dies intestate.—Universal suffrage. See suffrage.—Universal switch, an apparatus used in telegraph and telephone circuits for facilitating the connecting of one line to another. It usually consists of a large board or slab of insulating material, on the face of which are mounted two sets of parallel conducting rods placed across one another. Each rod forms the terminal of one line, and any two lines can be connected together by a plug which their terminal rods cross each other.—Universal Ylogism, theorem, time, etc. See the nouns.—Universal umbel. See umbel.—Universal unity, the case of uniting in many subjects while retaining its unity. This is the unity of a general character belonging to many objects.—Universal validity, cogency for all men. This is a phrase used by certain writers who misapprehend the doctrine of Kant.—Universal whole, a class with respect to the subjects included under it. = Syn. 3. General, etc. See common.

II. n. 1. In logic: (a) One of the five predicables of the Aristotelians, or logical varieties of predicates, which are said to be genus, species, difference, property, and accident. (b) A general term or predicate, or the general nature which such a term signifies. In order to understand the great dispute concerning universals it is necessary to remark that the word in this sense entirely departs from its etymology. The universe is incapable of general description, and consists of objects connected by dynamical relations and recognized by associations of contiguity; while a universal is an idea connected with experience by associations of resemblance merely. But though a universal is, in its universality, thus not contracted to actual existence, it does not necessarily follow that things real have in their real existence no universal predicates. The common belief is that the natural actions of things are subjected to laws that are really general—that the laws of mechanics, for instance, are not mere accidental uniformities, but have a real value. These laws may be subject to exceptions and interference; which has always been the vulgar belief, and in most ages that of philosophers; it may be they are never precisely followed. But any tendency in the things themselves toward generalizations of their characters constitutes what is termed a universal in re. Before the laws of physics were established it was particularly the uniformities of heredity, and consequent commonness of organic forms, which specially attracted attention; so that man and horse are the traditional examples of universals in re. The dispute concerning universals chiefly concerns the universals in re, and arises from the different degrees of importance attributed by different minds to the dynamical and to the intelligible relations of things. Those who follow the common opinion are called realists. The other party, looking at the blind dynamical character of the connections of things, denies that there is any real operation of law or intelligible guidance. These are the nominalists, who may take one of three main positions. First, there are those who hold that the uniformities of nature are due to the interference on every single occasion of general creative ideas, called universals ante rem. Second, there are those who admit that intelligible relations do govern one great department of creation—namely, the world of thought, so that there are general conceptions, called universals post rem—insist that the notion of a law of nature, properly speaking, is purely illusory. Things as they are are therefore entirely incomprehensible, and all that is intelligible is mere seeming. Yet this seeming has so consistent a character that it is for all intents and purposes the real world; and this seemingly real world is seemingly governed by law, which, indeed, is the only feature in it which makes it seem like real. This is substantially Kantianism. Third, there are those who deny universals in re, ante rem, and post rem, holding that association by resemblance is reducible to association by contiguity, that generalization takes place only upon paper or in talk, and that every fact is at bottom unintelligible. In the middle ages, if not at all times, the realistic opinion has often been carried too far, the mere resemblances of things, which are nothing but the native tendency of the mind to associate them, being supposed to indicate more intimate dynamical relations than can justly be inferred on such a ground alone.

2. The whole; the system of the universe.

To what end had the angel been set to keep the entrance into Paradise after Adam's expulsion if the universal had been paradise? Raleigh, Hist. World.

universals, universal; see universal.] 1. The state or character of being universal; unlimited application or extent.

Set before your faith the freeness and the universality of the promise. Consider of God's offer, and urging it upon all; and that he hath excepted from the conditional covenant no man in the world. Baxter, Saints' Rest, iv. 4.

Another objection to all this remedy is, its want of universality. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, ix. 14.

2. Unlimited adaptability; boundless versatility.

It was soon manifested that Garriek's universality, by reason of his natural endowments and acquired accomplishments, would no longer admit of any competitor for theatrical fame. Life of Quin (reprint 1857), p. 37.

3. The universe. Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iii.

universalization (ū-ni-vēr'sā'i-zā'shon), n. [< universalize + -ation.] The act or process of making universal or general; generalization. Also spelled universalisation.

Reflexion, by separating the essence or species from the subsistence, obtains the full specific idea (universalization). Encyc. Brit., XX. 858.

To find out what is morally right, we have only to ask what actions may be universalised. Caird, Hegel, p. 121.

The former Realism and Nominalism were lifted into a higher phase by the principle of the universalizing action of intellect. Encyc. Brit., II. 209.

universally (ū-ni-vēr'sā'i), adv. In a universal manner; as a universal; with extension to the whole; in a manner to comprehend all; without exception.

universallness (ū-ni-vēr'sā'l-nes), n. Universality.

universanimous (ū-ni-vēr-san'i-mus), a. [< L. universus, general, + animus, mind.] Of one mind or opinion; unanimous. Lovell, Biglow Papers, 2d ser., p. 36. [Rare.]

universe (ū-ni-vēr's), n. [< (F. univers = Sp. Pg. It. universo, < L. universum, all things, as a whole, the universe, neut. of universus, OL. oinvorsus, also contr. oinvorsus, later unvorsus, all together, whole, entire, collective, general, lit. turned or combined into one, < unus, one, + vertere, pp. versus, turn.) 1. The totality of existing things; all that is in dynamical connection with general experience taken collectively—embracing (a) the Creator and creation; or (b) psychical and material objects, but excluding the Creator; or (c) material objects only.

For nothing in this wide universe I call,
Save thou, my rose; in it thou art my all.
Shak., Sonnets, ix.

For this beauty of the universe is an emblem and revelation of the Divinity. Channing, Perfect Life, p. 13.

2. The whole world, all mankind; all that meets us in experience, in a loose sense.—3. In logic, the collection of all the objects to which any discourse refers: as, the universe of things. The things belonging to a universe cannot be defined or discriminated by any general characters; for every universal proposition excludes some general description of objects from the universe which has been supposed to be found in it. It is only in their dynamical connections that the objects of the universe can be distinguished from all others; and therefore in general term in a proposition can show what universe is meant; but an index is necessary. See index, n. 2.

Everything in the universe (whatever that universe may embrace) is either A or not A. De Morgan, Formal Logic (1847), ii.

We must be supposed to know the nature and limits of the universe of discourse with which we are concerned, whether we state it or not. If we are talking of ordinary phenomena we must know whether we refer to them without limit of time and space; and if not, within what limits, broadly speaking. If we include the realms of fiction and imagination we must know what boundaries we mean to put upon them. Venn, Symbolic Logic, vi.

Egg of the universe. See egg.—The hub of the universe. See hub.—Tree of the universe. See Yggdrasil.

Speaking with respect to the universality of things.

Barrow, Sermons, II. 12.

24. A corporation; a guild.

Some of them are worthy to be expelled both thence and out of the university.
Bp. Ridley, in Bradford's Works (Parker Soc.), II. 372.

3. An association of men for the purpose of study, which confers degrees which are acknowledged as valid throughout Christendom, is endowed, and is privileged by the state in order that the people may receive intellectual guidance, and that the theoretical problems which present themselves in the development of civilization may be resolved. The earliest university was the medical school of Salerno, which was closed in 1817, after a life of about a thousand years. The two models of all the other old universities were those of Bologna and Paris, the former a law school, the latter making theology its chief concern, both founded in the second half of the twelfth century—an epoch at which the advantages that were to accrue to the world from certain studies were strongly felt. The university of Paris had from the outset four faculties, or branches of study (a word also applied to the associate body of teachers in each branch)—theology, canon law, medicine, and arts. But the study of arts—including logic and rhetoric from the trivium, and the quadrivium (arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy)—was regarded as merely preliminary to the others, which alone, as attacking vital problems, entitled the university to its high privileges. Hence, upon inception as a master of arts a man did not cease to be called a "scholar"—a word which has consequently come to imply sound learning outside the three professions. It was the elucidation of theology which was above all desired and expected from the university; and the faculty of theology was organized more like a learned academy than as a seminary. The constitutions of universities are various and for the most part complicated. In Paris there were in each faculty three degrees, those of bachelor, licentiate, and master or doctor. Three years' study were required for a master in arts, and he must be twenty-one years of age. Five years' study more were required for the first degree in theology. The instruction was entirely by lectures, and the only exercises were disputations. Each faculty was presided over by a dean, and had two bedels and other servants. The four faculties met in congregation, and were presided over by the vice-chancellor. The position of chancellor was merely formal. For the purposes of administration, all the scholars, including the masters of arts, were divided into four nations, of Gaul, Picardy, Normandy, and England. This was an arrangement not going back to the origin of the university, though students from the same country had from the first clubbed together. Each nation was governed by a proctor, and possessed a seal. The students were mostly gathered into lecture halls, colleges, hostels, and pedagogies; and in 1459 the class of martinets, or unattached students, was abolished. The corporate institution in Paris and other northern universities embraced only the masters, not the other students, and for this reason it was not until late in the fourteenth century that, first in Germany, this body, called the studium generale, began to take the name of the universitas, or union—a word which had before and has since been used to include students of all grades. Along with the name of university, from before the restriction in its meaning, has always been associated the epithet of alma mater.—General council of the university. See council.—University extension, a method, originating in England, for extending the advantages of university instruction by means of lectures and classes at important centers.—University Test Act, an English statute of 1871 which abolished the subscribing to articles of faith, etc., before taking degrees.

Unless with death he do your rashness pay.

Greene, Alphonsus, v.

[By omission of a verb, implied in the context, unless may have the force of 'except,' 'but for': as,

Here nothing breeds

Unless the nightly owl

Shak., Tit. And., ii. 3. 97.

Let not wine,

Unless in sacrifice or rites divine,

Re ever known of shepherds.

Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, v. 5.]

= Syn. Except, Unless. Except could once be used as a synonym for unless, but the words have now drawn entirely apart. Unless is only a conjunction; except is only a preposition. Except introduces an exception to a statement which is otherwise general: it may be followed by a clause when connection is made by a particle, as when, that, as, while, or especially another preposition: the omission of such connective makes the structure archaic. Unless introduces a clause, or the abbreviation of a clause, indicating a limitation or condition.

unlessoned (un-les'nd), a. Not taught; not instructed. Shak., M. of V., iii. 2. 161. [Rare.]
